PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 107th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE—Friday, September 20, 2002

The Senate met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Honorable THOMAS R. CARPER, a Senator from the State of Delaware.

PRAYER

Almighty God, we claim Your promise: "I will not forget you. See, I have inscribed you on the palms of my hands." So with confidence we pray the ancient Hebrew childhood prayer from the 31st Psalm: "Father, into Your hands I commit my spirit." As we pray that prayer, we get ourselves off our own hands and into Your strong, competent hands. We take each of the fears in our jumbled mass of worries and concerns and commit them to You. You have promised to keep us in perfect peace, if we allow You to keep our minds stayed on You. Interrupt us when we get too busy and remind us that we are here to serve You. When we forget You, remind us that You never forget or forsake us. May that awesome assurance steady our course and fill our sails with the wind of Your power. You are our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable THOMAS R. CARPER led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, September 20, 2002.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable THOMAS R. CARPER, a Senator from the State of Delaware, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. CARPER thereupon assumed the Chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

SCHEDULE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, at 10:30 we will vote on the nomination of Reena Raggi to be a United States Circuit Judge for the Second Circuit. Following that vote, the Senate will be in a period of morning business until noon. We are expecting to go out of session shortly thereafter.

This is in preparation for next week which will be a very busy week. Everyone should understand that. Next week could be a very big week. We are going to do everything we can to complete work on the homeland security bill. I have tried previously, in the form of unanimous consent, and have been unsuccessful, but we really need to move off the Interior appropriations bill. It is obvious, because of the forest feud that is in that legislation, that that bill is not going to go forward. We should not be wasting the morning standing around here doing nothing.

I hope the minority will allow us, by consent, to spend all day each day next week on the homeland security bill so we can finish that bill. The two or three big amendments on that legislation have not yet been offered. We expect that to happen early next week. Later today, we will reoffer the unanimous consent request that we temporarily set aside the Interior bill and move on to the homeland security bill on a full-time basis. That would be the thing to do.

I have said before—and I really believe this to be the case; I sadly say this—that the minority is working toward our accomplishing nothing. They simply don't want us to complete the other appropriation bills. We have asked to be able to move off Interior and to go to another appropriations bill. They won't let us do that. They said there would be no more two-tracking of legislation, which is fine. But at least they should let us move off Interior so we can have full days on homeland security.

The President says he wants this legislation. His wants cannot be accomplished unless we are able to legislate on a full-time basis on it. Once we get started on something, we are back on Interior doing nothing. It takes time to get revved up again on homeland security. I hope that can be accomplished today, that we can get off Interior.

It seems quite clear that the efforts to arrive at a compromise have failed. People have tried hard, and certainly no one is to be faulted, but sometimes we have issues that are irreconcilable. In the Senate, simple majorities don't solve problems that are irreconcilable; it takes 60 votes. The proposition that the majority has offered can't get 60 votes. The proposition of the minority can't get 60 votes. It would be in the best interest of the country that we move off that legislation. Maybe later someone will come up with some kind of a brainstorm to figure some way out of it, but at this stage we have not been able to.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 10 minutes each.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a member of the Senate on the floor.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote begin 2 or 3 minutes early, and the leader asked me to announce this will be the last vote today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

NOMINATION OF REENA RAGGI TO BE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the hour of 10:29 a.m. having arrived, the Senate will proceed to executive session and consider Executive Calendar No. 1006, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Reena Raggi, of New York, to be United States Circuit Judge for the Second Circuit.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, today the Senate will confirm the nomination of Judge Reena Raggi to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. This is the 14th circuit court nominee to be considered by the Senate since the change in Senate majority and reorganization of the Judiciary Committee 14 months ago. That is an average of one Court of Appeals judge a month since the Democratic majority has been in place. This pace is almost double that maintained by the Republicans during their 6½ years of control of the Senate. This is also the 78th judicial nominee we have confirmed in the past 14 months.

In contrast, our Republican predecessors voted on only 46 of President Clinton's more moderate Court of Appeals nominations in their 76 months of control for an average of closer to one circuit court confirmation every other month. In fact, during the entire 1996 session the Senate Republicans stalled all Court of Appeals nominees and not a single one was confirmed. Court of Appeals vacancies went from 16, when the Republicans took over in January 1995, to 33 by the time they finally relinquished control last summer and allowed the Judiciary Committee to reorganize. During the Republican stall on judicial confirmations, vacancies more than doubled on the Courts of Appeals. However, since last summer, the Democratic majority has exceeded the rate of attrition and confirmed 14 circuit court judges, in addition to 64 district court judges. Even with extraordinary attrition of 10 new circuit vacancies during this period, we have lowered the number of Court of Appeals vacancies from the 41 it would have been if Democrats were blocking judges as Republicans falsely claim, to 27.

There are now fewer circuit court vacancies than when the 107th Congress began. Republicans confirmed no circuit court nominees or any judicial nominees during their 6 months of control last year. They could have confirmed some of the nine circuit judges re-nominated by President Clinton, if they were truly concerned about the circuit court vacancy level. They could have done that to demonstrate some commitment to fairness and the bipartisanship they claim. But they did not. The President could have urged that those circuit court nominees be confirmed to demonstrate true bipartisanship and to address the injustices of the stalling tactics of the members of his party in the Senate. He did not. Instead, he withdrew all those circuit court nominees last spring then later renominated only one of them, occasioning more needless delay.

I would like to reflect on what could have been, but for the purposeful obstruction by Republican Senators of the confirmation of more than a score of President Clinton's circuit court nominees. If Republicans had not blocked the confirmation of almost two dozen, 22, circuit court nominees, and many more district court nominees, Democrats on the Judiciary Committee would have begun with 11 circuit court vacancies, instead of the 33 we inherited. With the 10 new circuit court vacancies that arose over these past 14 months, there would have been a total of 24 circuit court vacancies for this President to fill. Given the Democratic pace of considering circuit court nominees, even without any significant cooperation or consultation from the White House, our circuit courts would today be left with only 10 vacancies. That is what might have been, but for the determined, strategic blocking of so many circuit court nominees during the 6½ years of Republican control of the Senate. Instead, after 14 circuit confirmations, there remain 27 circuit court vacancies—still fewer than at the start of this Congress but far from where we could have been.

The Judiciary Committee has already voted on 83 of this President's judicial nominees, including 17 nominees to the Courts of Appeal. Two additional circuit court nominees have had hearings and another is scheduled for a hearing this coming week. The Senate Judiciary Committee has already voted on more circuit and district court nominees than in any of the previous 6½ years of Republican control. In fact, Democrats have given votes to more judicial nominees and, in particular, to more nominees to the Courts of Appeals, than in 1996 and 1997 combined, and than in the last 30 months of the Republican majority control in 1999, 2000 and early 2001.

Judge Raggi was appointed to the Federal trial court in 1987 by President Ronald Reagan. She has a solid record of accomplishment in both the private and public sectors. She received the strong support of her two Democratic Senators, CHUCK SCHUMER and HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, and of the New York legal community. Even though Judge Raggi is a conservative Republican, we have every reason to believe that she will serve with distinction on the Second Circuit as a fair and impartial judge.

Her record is in sharp contrast to the record of the other circuit court nominee that the Judiciary Committee considered on the very same day: Justice Priscilla Owen, a nominee whose record was too extreme even for the very conservative Texas Supreme Court. Justice Owen's written opinions demonstrated her willingness to substitute her policy preferences for those of the Texas legislature and her determination to distort precedent. Even her fellow judges criticized her approach.

The administration's claim that Democrat's have created a glass ceiling for female judicial nominees is patently ridiculous. It is unfortunate that just 21 percent of President George W. Bush's judicial nominees are women, in contrast to 30 percent of President Clinton's judicial nominees. The percentage of women nominated by this President has been cut by almost a third compared with the prior administration. In fact, so far, President George W. Bush is appointing almost the same proportion of women to the Federal bench as his father, despite the passage of more than a decade since then in which the number of women practicing law and with judicial experience has increased exponentially.

With today's vote, the Democratic-led Senate has already confirmed 17 female judicial nominees of this President, including four to the Courts of Appeal Judge Edith Brown Clement to the Fifth Circuit, the first nominee to be confirmed to that court in more than 6 years; Judge Julia Smith Gibbons to the Sixth Circuit, the first nominee to be confirmed to that court in more than 5 years; Judge Sharon Prost to the Federal Circuit; and now Judge Reena Raggi to the Second Circuit. In all, Democrats have held hearings for 19 of the women nominated to the Federal bench by this President, and 18 of them have been voted on by the Judiciary Committee. A few of the remaining female nominees lack home-State consent, and some were nominated only recently and so lack completed paperwork. This Democratic-led Senate has regularly scheduled hearings and votes, unlike during the prior 6½ years of Republican control when so many women and minorities nominated to the Federal bench were never accorded hearings or votes.

Today's vote serves as another example of the Democrats' proven record of action and fairness on this President's judicial nominees. Judge Raggi is a conservative Republican. I voted for her confirmation in committee and vote to confirm her today, based on her overall record, her testimony before the committee and the bipartisan support she has received. Far from payback for Republican actions in the recent past, today's Democratic-led Senate's action is being taken notwithstanding those wrongs and to help fill vacancies that Republican obstruction helped create.

Despite the right-wing and partisan din about blockades and obstructionism, Democrats are actually achieving almost twice as much as our Republican counterparts did to provide judicial resources to the Federal courts. We would be even farther along if so many circuit court nominees of the prior administration had not been purposely blocked and defeated, and if we received more timely reviews from the ABA, and received the nominations of more moderate, mainstream judicial nominees.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, I am very pleased that the Senate has taken up the nomination of Judge Reena Raggi to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. She is a truly exceptional nominee with wide and well deserved bipartisan support.

We first became aware of Judge Raggi's outstanding credentials fifteen years ago, when the Senate confirmed to her nomination as a district judge for the Eastern District of New York. She received her Bachelor of Arts degree from Wellesley College and went on to graduate cum laude from Harvard Law School. She clerked for Judge Thomas E. Fairchild, then Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, before working as an associate at the law firm of Cahill, Gordon & Reindel.

She then entered public service in Brooklyn, New York as an Assistant U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York. She quickly rose through the ranks of the U.S. Attorney's Office, first to become head of the Narcotics Unit, then Chief of Special Prosecutions, which is in charge of prosecuting public corruption. In 1986, the Eastern District Board of Judges appointed here interim United States Attorney pending the Senate confirmation of a presidential nominee. A year later, Judge Raggi was nominated and confirmed as a district court judge.

That was 15 years ago. Today, I am proud to say that Judge Raggi has continued to serve as a jurist of the highest level of excellence. In fact, for the first 7 years of her tenure as a district judge, she was the least reversed judge in the Second Circuit.

Judge Raggi has presided over some of the most famous and infamous cases to be tried in New York's Federal court. Recently, she was the judge in the civil rights prosecution of former New York City police officer Charles Schwartz for the sexual battery of Abner Louima. We are all sadly familiar with the facts of Mr. Louima's case: While in police custody, officers savagely beat him in the bathroom of a New York City precinct house. This case was ramanded to Judge Raggi's court by the Second Circuit for retrial following the death of the original trial court judge. The retrial resulted in a perjury conviction against Mr. Schwartz.

Judge Raggi also presided over the trial of Thomas "Tommy Karate" Pitera, the first Federal death penalty case in New York in three decades.

Beginning in 1993, Judge Raggi presided over a series of cases stemming from the alien smuggling scandal of the "Golden Venture," a freighter that ran aground in Rockaway, NY. Almost 300 illegal aliens transported in deplorable conditions had to swim for shore, and 10 of the passengers died escaping the ship. The judge in 1994 rejected plea bargains reached by the government with seven of the Golden Venture defendants, finding that sentences of between 12 to 30 months in prison did not "adequately do justice" because the terms did not reflect the seriousness of the crimes.

Judge Raggi also played a significant role in the war against terrorism. In 1998, she oversaw the trial of Palestinian terrorist Gazi Abu Mezer, who was convicted of plotting a subway bombing aimed at Jews. The judge sentenced Mr. Mezer to life in prison.

All of this hard work and dedication to the law is reflected in Judge Raggi's ABA rating of unanimously "Well Qualified." This rating, of course, is the highest that the ABA awards. Her excellence has been reflected by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals' invitation to have her sit by designation on many of its panels.

Clearly, Judge Raggi represents the very best in our Nation's judges and will be an outstanding addition to the Second Circuit. I look forward to voting in favor of her nomination and hearing of her accomplishments in the future.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Reena Raggi, of New York, to be United States Circuit Judge for the Second Circuit? The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, with Senators permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes each, and with the time to be equally divided between the two leaders or their designees.

The Senator from New York.

THE ECONOMY AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. CLINTON. Mr. President, I rise today to talk about an issue of great concern to my constituents and, indeed, to our entire country—the state of our Nation's economy. We know our economy was already in recession on September 10 and it was devastated on September 11 by the horrific attacks we suffered, and it is stalled now. Too many Americans are out of work. Too many have seen their pension and retirement security disappear because of the illegal, unethical, and simply inexplicable behavior of corporate executives. Too many people who lost their jobs as a result of September 11 have not yet been able to find work.

Let me just mention one of the hundreds of thousands—millions of such people: A New Yorker by the name of Felix Batista. Mr. Batista had worked for years, 25 years I believe, as a member of the wait staff at the restaurant known as Windows On The World at the top of the World Trade Center. He has four children. He was on vacation on September 11 when 73 of his coworkers were murdered. He lost not only friends and colleagues, he lost his job, and he has been unemployed since that terrible day. He is a man who had a wonderful employment record who now spends his days looking for work. He exhausted his unemployment benefits almost 3 months ago. How is he going to support his four children? He is a victim of the terrorist attacks on New York and America, and he is not alone.

Like so many other New Yorkers and Americans, despite their steadfast efforts to find work, and their overwhelming desire to get back to work, they remain out of work, struggling to make ends meet. In New York, there are 135,000 New Yorkers who have exhausted their benefits. Across the country, the number of people who have been unemployed for 6 months or longer has almost doubled, from 800,000 to 1.5 million in the last year, and that number is expected to increase to more than 2 million by December.

What have we, the elected representatives of all the people, including the people who are unemployed, the people such as Felix who have lost their jobs—what have we done to respond? We have extended unemployment benefits once—but only once. Contrast that with the recession of the early 1990s when Congress extended temporary benefits five times. But this year, even in the wake of the combination of a slowdown in the economy and terrorism, we have only extended benefits once. Once is not enough. Congress must act to extend unemployment insurance and disaster unemployment assistance for an additional 13 weeks each.

With more people losing their benefits every day and being put into the terrible position in which Mr. Batista finds himself, these extensions should be passed before Congress adjourns.

The Wall Street Journal says our economy is in the midst of a "jobless recovery." From what I hear, that phrase is only half true.

Across New York State, 553,000 New Yorkers are out of work, and the same story is true of company layoffs and plant closings in Niagara Falls, Rochester, and so many parts of New York.

Unfortunately, this is a story that is compounded by the corporate irresponsibility and illegality. They have added even more uncertainty to our economic condition. We not only are seeing plants closing and people losing their jobs because there is no business and there are no orders, but we are also in Rochester seeing 500 people out of work after Global Crossing filed for bankruptcy.

If there is any doubt that the economic situation is not producing jobs for people, take a look at this chart. It shows the number of jobs that are available compared with the number of people who are looking for work. As you can clearly see, during most of 2002, jobseekers far outnumbered job availability. In fact, in June, there were almost three jobseekers for every available job.

When President Bush took office in January 2001, there were approximately 1.5 jobseekers for every job. In just a short year and a half, we have gone from one job opening for every one and a half unemployed person to one job opening for nearly three unemployed persons.

But only looking at the statistics and the unemployment rate doesn't paint a complete picture. The constituents that I talk to in New York describe an endless, frustrating job search—that hopeless feeling that comes when you go out every day and read the want ads and follow up every single lead. These are people who are young and old and middle-aged. They are male, they are female, they are skilled and unskilled; they are white, they are black, and they are Latino. They are every kind of American. They want to work. But until this economy turns around, they need additional help.

The so-called jobless recovery has hit long-term unemployed workers particularly hard. The number of people who cannot find jobs for 6 months or longer has grown by almost 90 percent in the past year. In fact, the share of the unemployed today who have been without work for more than 26 weeks exceeds that of the recession of the early 1990s and the early 1980s.

According to a recent study, "an increase in the long term unemployment of workers with significant workforce experience" is particularly striking. But why should we be surprised? We have companies such as Enron, Global Crossing, WorldCom, and Tyco that are laying off, going into bankruptcy, and rendering unemployed highly skilled workers—people who got their education, went to college, and improved their skills. They were part of the new economy, and, all of a sudden, they find themselves on the unemployment lines.

What this means for real Americans is that people who are trying hard, who have played by the rules, who have been responsible, and, through no fault of their own—a corporate executive who commits illegalities, or a terrorist who destroys a building—are now unemployed.

The number of workers who have exhausted their benefits has doubled compared to 2 years ago. The number of workers who have exhausted their State benefits is 2.3 million, more than we had 10 years ago during the recession of the early 1990s.

As you can see from this chart, the number of workers exhausting their unemployment benefits without a job has risen steadily since last spring. If you are wondering what this means for individual States, I have information about every State in our country. This is not just a New York problem. This is a national problem. We may have the highest number of people who have exhausted their benefits, but, of course, you would expect that. We lost tens of thousands of jobs because of the attack and the collapse of the buildings. Because it was a crime scene, they couldn't reopen and get back into business.

Our unemployment rate in New York City is 8 percent—higher than the national average—unfortunately reflecting a condition that affects all Americans.

Back in the recession of the early 1990s when the first President Bush was in office, people who were unfortunate enough to lose their jobs got a compassionate response from the White House. The first President Bush said: You know, I am going to be there to help you. And, working with the Congress, that is exactly what happened. We extended unemployment benefits five times.

Are the people today less deserving? Are the workers who lost their jobs because of corporate illegality, economic slowdown, or terrorist attacks somehow not worthy of our help? I don't think so. I certainly hope not.

As you can see from this chart, which has a lot of writing on it, basically the bottom line is that during the early stage of the recession in the 1990s, 35 States received 26 weeks of benefits, and 16 received 33 weeks. And it is so clear that today during our recession we only have 39 States getting 13 weeks of benefits and 12 receiving 26.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 10 minutes.

Mrs. CLINTON. I ask unanimous consent for another 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mrs. CLINTON. This is not only a comparison—it should cause us to wonder what our national policy is—it is also a reflection of how we have no economic policy in America right now. We don't have an emphasis on creating jobs, prosperity, and economic opportunity.

Our leader, Senator DASCHLE, came to the floor earlier this week and, in a series of charts, made clear that we are not attending to America's business. We all know we have foreign policy challenges. I, for one, have supported our men and women in uniform and supported our need for homeland security. I will continue to do so because our threats are real, and we have to deal with them. But we are a great nation. We can do more than one thing at a time. We should be paying attention to our economy. We should be taking care of our unemployed workers. It is the right thing to do. I hope we will do it because it takes care of people.

Look at this next chart. Every dollar we spend on unemployment insurance adds $2.50 to our gross domestic product. It is a good investment. Why? Because when the unemployed get those benefits—when Mr. Batista and others like him finally get some help—what do they do? They go out and spend it. They have no other means. They have to buy food, they have to pay the rent, and they have to make a car payment. The money goes right into the economy, and it provides stimulus.

In contrast, President Bush's solution is to stimulate the economy for the wealthiest—keep giving them big tax cuts and hope that it trickles down to people such as Mr. Batista. That didn't work in the 1980s, it didn't work in the 1990s, and it will not work in the 21st century, either.

I believe the President is using the wrong approach. Our economy needs to help people. It needs to stimulate jobs. And we owe it to the unemployed such as Mr. Batista to act now.

Finally, obviously, I believe our economic policy during the 1990s worked for all Americans—the rich, middle income, and poor. It provided more than 22 million new jobs. We were on the right track in America when it came to the economy. For reasons that escape me, we threw all of that good work away, and now we are back into the deficits. We are not taking care of the unemployed. We are not creating jobs. And I don't think we have any plan to do so.

I earnestly request that our colleagues here take leadership and support our unemployed people. Do what was done in the 1990s, provide these benefits, stimulate the economy, and let us get back on the right track for America's future.

Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional 15 minutes over and above the order that has been entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

IRAQ

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I call attention to an article in the Washington Post of September 15, Sunday, the final edition. I shall read excerpts therefrom. The headline: "In Iraqi War Scenario, Oil Is Key Issue; U.S. Drillers Eye Huge Petroleum Pool." The article is by Dan Morgan and David B. Ottaway, Washington Post staff writers.

I will proceed now with reading the first three paragraphs:

> A U.S.-led ouster of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein would open a bonanza for American oil companies long banished from Iraq, scuttling oil deals between Baghdad and Russia, France and other countries, and reshuffling world petroleum markets, according to industry officials and leaders of the Iraqi opposition.
>
> Although senior Bush administration officials say they have not begun to focus on the issues involving oil and Iraq, American and foreign oil companies have already begun maneuvering for a stake in the country's huge proven reserves of 112 billion barrels of crude oil, the largest in the world outside Saudi Arabia.
>
> The importance of Iraq's oil has made it potentially one of the administration's biggest bargaining chips in negotiations to win backing from the U.N. Security Council and Western allies for President Bush's call for tough international action against Hussein. All five permanent members of the Security Council—the United States, Britain, France, Russian and China—have international oil companies with major stakes in a change of leadership in Baghdad.
>
> "It's pretty straightforward," said former CIA director R. James Woolsey, who has been one of the leading advocates of forcing Hussein from power. "France and Russia have oil companies and interests in Iraq. They should be told that if they are of assistance in moving Iraq toward decent government, we'll do the best we can to ensure that the new government and American companies work closely with them." But he added: "If they throw in their lot with Saddam, it will be difficult to the point of impossible to persuade the new Iraqi government to work with them."
>
> Indeed, the mere prospect of a new Iraqi government has fanned concerns by non-American oil companies that they will be excluded by the United States, which almost certainly would be the dominant foreign power in Iraq in the aftermath of Hussein's fall.

Are you listening? Out there in America, are you listening?

Let me say that again, with reference to former CIA Director R. James Woolsey:

> But he added: "If they throw in their lot with Saddam, it will be difficult to the point of impossible to persuade the new Iraqi government to work with them."
>
> Indeed, the mere prospect of a new Iraqi government has fanned concerns by non-American oil companies that they will be excluded by the United States—

Hear that—

Are we paying attention?

> Representatives of many foreign oil concerns have been meeting with leaders of the Iraqi opposition to make their case for a future stake and to sound them out about their intentions.
>
> Since the Persian Gulf War in 1991, companies from more than a dozen nations, including France, Russia, China, India, Italy, Vietnam and Algeria, have either reached or sought to reach agreements in principle to develop Iraqi oil fields, refurbish existing facilities or explore undeveloped tracts. Most of the deals are on hold until the lifting of U.N. sanctions.
>
> But Iraqi opposition officials made clear in interviews last week that they will not be bound by any of the deals.

It is a lengthy article, Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BYRD. Now, Mr. President, let me call attention to an editorial in today's Charleston, WV, Gazette, titled, "Bush, Cheney won't stop."

And I read therefrom:

>
> The White House continues its mantra—

Now listen. This is the Charleston, WV, Gazette.

> The White House continues its mantra that war is necessary because Saddam is "evil" and he's secretly making weapons of mass destruction. But this justification may be a smoke screen.

Are you listening? Are you listening, the people out there throughout this great land? Are you listening?

> . . . this justification may be a smoke screen. Some observers say the administration's hidden motive is to gain control of Iraq's oil.
>
> In a front-page Sunday report subtitled "U.S. Drillers Eye Huge Petroleum Pool," The Washington Post said America's oil industry—to which Bush and Cheney are closely tied—eagerly wants a "regime change" in Iraq so U.S. firms can begin drilling into Iraq's vast, 112-billion-barrel reserve.

So the Charleston Gazette of today calls attention to the Washington Post article which I have already read and have included in the RECORD, the Washington Post article of last Sunday.

Continuing with the Gazette editorial:

> The White House supports the London-based Iraqi National Congress, an umbrella > organization of exiled Iraqi groups seeking to remove Saddam. INC [Iraqi National Congress] leader Ahmed Chalabi told the Post [the Washington Post] that, when a new regime is installed in Baghdad, "American companies will have a big shot at Iraqi oil."

>

And I have also referred to his remarks. But let me continue with the Charleston Gazette editorial:

> Amazing!

In referring to what Mr. Woolsey was saying, the Gazette said:

> Amazing. This implies that Bush's war urge isn't about "evil" or weapons. It's about oil.

> Atlanta Journal-Constitution columnist Cynthia Tucker said the White House war demands are "tainted with the sickening smell of gasoline."

Now, that was the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. That is a Georgia paper that is known and read nationwide and internationally.

Let me read what that column said again:

> Atlanta Journal-Constitution columnist Cynthia Tucker said the White House war demands are "tainted with the sickening smell of gasoline."

> "If the Bush administration invades Iraq," she wrote—

Atlanta Journal-Constitution columnist Cynthia Tucker—

> "future scholars will look back on this period and name the period for what it was: the Petroleum Wars. . . . What but oil could possibly explain the Bush administration's stubborn insistence on attacking Saddam Hussein, who had no connection to the atrocities of Sept. 11?"
>
> Senator Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., has taken the lead in questioning President Bush's warplans.
>
> We hope that he and colleagues in Congress try to learn whether the White House war cry is designed to serve America's oil industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Gazette editorial in its entirety be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 14½ minutes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have an additional 10 minutes, if needed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, before the Nation is committed to war, before we send our sons and daughters to battle in faraway lands, there are critical questions that must be asked, and it is not unpatriotic to ask questions.

To date, the answers from the administration have been less than satisfying. After weeks of criticism from Congress and, indeed, from the countries of the world, President Bush went to the United Nations to press his case that Iraq posed a serious threat to the peace and security of the globe. But instead of offering compelling evidence that the Iraqi regime had taken steps to advance its weapons program to the point that it is necessary for the United States to deliver an unprovoked attack on a sovereign state—namely, Iraq—the President offered the U.N. more of a warning than an appeal for support.

Instead of using the forum of the U.N. General Assembly to offer evidence and proof of his claims, the President basically told the nations of the world that "you are either with me or against me."

"Do not question this stand," the President said. If the U.N. is unwilling to act, then "by heritage and by choice, the United States of America will make that stand."

While Mr. Bush tried to play the role of an international prosecutor, his case was at best circumstantial. He did a fine job in laying out the facts with regard to the failure of the United Nations to uphold and take more compelling action in upholding its previous resolutions. He made a fine statement in that regard. He made it clear that the United Nations had not enforced its resolutions. Sixteen resolutions had been adopted by that agency.

But in the days that followed that address, the administration officials have attempted to provide some answers to the looming question. However, this week, when asked by the House Armed Services Committee members what was new, what was compelling to force the hand of this Nation against Saddam Hussein, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld offered nothing new. He pointed to the terrorist acts of September 11 as compelling reason, and he said:

> The last thing we want is a smoking gun. A gun smokes after it has been fired. The goal must be to stop Saddam Hussein before he fires a weapon of mass destruction against our people.

Well, he said the same thing before the Senate Armed Services Committee on yesterday. He said: We are being asked what is new.

He said: What is new? September 11.

Well, September 11 is not all that new, Mr. President, September 11 was 365 plus 9 days, in other words, 374 days ago. That is not so new.

With reference to Mr. Rumsfeld's statement concerning a smoking gun, when he said, "The last thing we want is a smoking gun. A gun smokes after it has been fired"—my concern, Mr. President, is that the United States, in forcing war in Iraq, will end up shooting itself in the foot. Unless proper care and deliberation precede any action, we must not be hell-bent on an invasion until we have exhausted every other possible option to assess and eliminate Iraq's supposed weapons of destruction program.

The United States must not act alone. The United States must have the support of the world.

Yesterday, the administration sent to Congress a draft resolution to authorize the use of American military might against Iraq. In that resolution, President Bush requests approval to "use all means" he determines to be appropriate. In other words, the President is saying: Authorize me, the President, authorize the President to "use all means" he, the President, determines to be appropriate.

Congress must not hand this administration or any other administration a blank check for military action, period. What Congress needs is solid evidence. What we need are answers. Does Saddam Hussein pose an imminent threat to the United States? Should the United States act alone as this administration has been threatening to do? Should Congress grant the President authority to launch a preemptive attack on Iraq? What would be the repercussions in the Middle East? What would be the repercussions around the globe?

How many civilians would die in Iraq? How many American men and women would be involved? Will even greater numbers of National Guardsmen and Reserves be called up to prepare for an invasion? And if they are, what will happen to the war on terrorism here at home? Will troops be shifted from other missions to support a war against Iraq?

We have 8,500 men and women in Afghanistan. We have forces in the Philippines, in Bosnia, in Kosovo and in many other places throughout the world. What are we going to do, pull all of them out of those faraway places and use them in an unprovoked attack on the sovereign state of Iraq?

How do we afford this war? The gulf war cost $61 billion. The gulf war of a decade ago cost $61 billion. Of that, other countries coughed up, in cash and in contributions in kind, $54 billion, leaving, I believe, roughly $7 billion, the cost to American taxpayers.

Now, what would it cost this time if other nations are not helping the United States to bear the financial burden? Bruce Lindsey, the President's economic adviser, says it might cost $100 billion or $200 billion. And then he said: $100 billion why, that is nothing. He is quoted in the press as saying: $100 billion? That is nothing. Yet, this administration won't get its feet out of the concrete and head out of the sand when it comes to raising the top line for Congress to be able to utilize in passing 13 appropriations bills and sending them to the President—not willing to agree to $9 billion more than the President's foot-in-concrete figure of $759 billion.

Congress needs $768 billion. The House chairman, Mr. YOUNG, and this chairman in the Senate, and Senator TED STEVENS, ranking member on the Senate Appropriations Committee, have agreed, and others agreed—and this Senate has agreed—it should be $768 billion. There is a $9 billion gap between what the President says and what the Congress needs to meet the needs of the people. I am talking about veterans' care, education, homeland security, and so on, these are the needs.

Congress would require—and has already reported bills out of the Senate Appropriations Committee which assume the figure $768 billion. The President and his OMB Director say, no, $759 billion; that is all. So, here we are—stuck; 13 appropriations bills are stuck because of the administration's immovability in dealing with the needs of the American people here at home.

The Administration, says: No, we won't accept that. Hence, we have 13 appropriations bills stuck.

Lawrence Lindsey has reportedly said, with reference to a war against Iraq: "Oh, that might cost $100 billion or $200 billion. $100 billion? Well, that is nothing." That is the attitude of this administration. That is the attitude of this administration.

Has the United States ruled out responding with nuclear weapons should Saddam Hussein use chemical or biological weapons against our soldiers? Does Saddam Hussein have the capability to unleash weapons of mass destruction within the United States? Does the United States have adequate military and intelligence resources to fight a war in Afghanistan and a war in Iraq while, at the same time, mobilizing resources to prevent or defend against attack within our own shores? What will happen to this war here at home?

What will happen to homeland security if the President unleashes an unprovoked attack on Iraq? Does anyone believe there would not be any repercussions here at home? We have terrorists within our midst in this country. They are all about us. The FBI arrested six in New York just recently. So the FBI is on the job. The FBI is working to defend this country. But what else might happen? Are we focused too greatly on fighting suspected terrorism overseas, while focusing too little on the threat of terrorism here at home? What is going to happen to the needs of this country—the monetary needs and the needs with respect to security of our nuclear plants? What is going to happen at our ports of entry and on our borders? What is going to happen within our midst if the President launches an unprovoked attack on Iraq?

These are questions—and there are many more questions—that will be asked. If it is unpatriotic to ask questions, then I am unpatriotic. Is it unpatriotic to ask questions, when this President is seeking powers that have never been given to any other President?

On September 19, yesterday, the President sent to Congress his suggested text for a resolution to authorize war with Iraq. The problems with this proposed resolution are numerous. When taken as a whole, this resolution would constitute the broadest possible grant of war powers to any President in the history of our Republic. The President has inherent powers under the Constitution to repel a sudden, unforeseen attack on this Nation—nobody argues with that—but he doesn't have inherent power under that Constitution to launch an unprovoked offensive military attack on another nation or state.

The resolution is an affront to the powers given by the Constitution to Congress on matters of war. The first 2 pages of the draft resolution have 16 "whereas" clauses that would serve to explain the intent of Congress—if the resolution were adopted as it is written—in passing the resolution for the use of force.

These clauses, as conceived by the White House, include numerous distortions of fact. For example, in the ninth "whereas" clause, it is asserted that the United States has the inherent right, as acknowledged in the U.N. Charter, to use force in order to defend itself, as if that is a justification for preemptive war. Let me read the relevant section of the U.N. Charter:

> Nothing in the present charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

That does not seem to justify a preemptive attack. In the 16th clause, it is asserted that:

> The President has the authority under the Constitution to use force in order to defend the national security interests of the United States.

At last, the administration has awakened to the fact that there is still a Constitution. That is the first time that I have ever read anything or heard anything from the administration that would invoke the Constitution in this matter. Let's see what they are saying.

In the 16th "whereas" clause it is asserted that:

> The President has the authority under the Constitution to use force in order to defend the national security interests of the United States.

Well, that is the broadest reading of the Commander in Chief clause I think I have ever seen. What about the power of the Congress under article I, section 8 of the Constitution to declare war? That is not mentioned at all in the resolution proposed by the White House.

Mr. President, the White House resolution would authorize the President to use all means that he determines—that he determines. What a colossus this President is going to become if the Senate gives him this kind of authority. The White House resolution would authorize the President to use all means that he determines appropriate.

What does that mean? What does "appropriate" mean here? It would authorize the President to use all means that he—I repeat, that he—determines appropriate, including forces, to restore international peace and security in the region.

Mr. President, that is not an authorization for war with Iraq only. That language would allow the President to march our troops into Iran, Syria, Lebanon, Yemen, the West Bank, and anywhere else that is part of the Middle East or where the United States has any security interest in the Middle East. I cannot believe the gall and the arrogance of the White House in requesting such a broad grant of war powers.

Mr. President, this is the worst kind of election year politics!

IN IRAQI WAR SCENARIO, OIL IS KEY ISSUE; U.S. DRILLERS EYE HUGE PETROLEUM POOL

(By Dan Morgan and Davis B. Ottaway)

A U.S.-led ouster of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein could open a bonanza for American oil companies long banished from Iraq, scuttling oil deals between Baghdad and Russia, France and other countries, and reshuffling world petroleum markets, according to industry officials and leaders of the Iraqi opposition.

Although senior Bush administration officials say they have not begun to focus on the issues involving oil and Iraq, American and foreign oil companies have already begun maneuvering for a stake in the country's huge proven reserves of 112 billion barrels of crude oil, the largest in the world outside Saudi Arabia.

The importance of Iraq's oil had made it potentially one of the administration's biggest bargaining chips in negotiations to win backing from the U.N. Security Council and Western allies for President Bush's call for tough international action against Hussein. All five permanent members of the Security Council—the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China—have international oil companies with major stakes in a change of leadership in Baghdad.

"It's pretty straightforward," said former CIA director R. James Woolsey, who has been one of the leading advocates of forcing Hussein from power. "France and Russia have oil companies and interests in Iraq. They should be told that if they are of assistance in moving Iraq toward decent government, we'll do the best we can to ensure that the new government and American companies work closely with them." But he added: "If they throw in their lot with Saddam, it will be difficult to the point of impossible to persuade the new Iraqi government to work with them."

Indeed, the mere prospect of a new Iraqi government has fanned concerns by non-American oil companies that they will be excluded by the United States, which almost certainly would be the dominant foreign power in Iraq in the aftermath of Hussein's fall. Representatives of many foreign oil concerns have been meeting with leaders of the Iraqi opposition to make their case for a future stake and to sound them out about their intentions.

Since the Persian Gulf War in 1991, companies from more than a dozen nations, including France, Russia, China, India, Italy, Vietnam and Algeria, have either reached or sought to reach agreements in principle to develop Iraqi oil fields, refurbish existing facilities or explore undeveloped tracts. Most of the deals are on hold until the lifting of U.N. sanctions.

But Iraqi opposition officials made clear in interviews last week that they will not be bound by any of the deals.

"We will review all these agreements, definitely," said Faisal Qaragholi, a petroleum engineer who directs the London office of the Iraqi National Congress (INC), an umbrella organization of opposition groups that is backed by the United States. "Our oil policies should be decided by a government in Iraq elected by the people."

Ahmed Chalabi, the INC leader, went even further, saying he favored the creation of a U.S.-led consortium to develop Iraq's oil fields, which have deteriorated under more than a decade of sanctions. "American companies will have a big shot at Iraqi oil," Chalabi said.

The INC, however, said it has not taken a formal position on the structure of Iraq's oil industry in event of a change of leadership.

While the Bush administration's campaign against Hussein is presenting vast possibilities for multinational oil giants, it poses major risks and uncertainties for the global oil market, according to industry analysts.

Access to Iraqi oil and profits will depend on the nature and intentions of a new government. Whether Iraq remains a member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, for example, or seeks an independent role, free of the OPEC cartel's quotas, will have an impact on oil prices and the flow of investments to competitors such as Russia, Venezuela and Angola.

While Russian oil companies such as Lukoil have a major financial interest in developing Iraqi fields, the low prices that could result from a flood of Iraqi oil into world markets could set back Russian government efforts to attract foreign investment in its untapped domestic fields. That is because low world oil prices could make costly ventures to unlock Siberia's oil treasures far less appealing.

Bush and Vice President Cheney have worked in the oil business and have longstanding ties to the industry. But despite the buzz about the future of Iraqi oil among oil companies, the administration, preoccupied with military planning and making the case about Hussein's potential threat, has yet to take up the issue in a substantive way, according to U.S. officials.

The Future of Iraq Group, a task force set up at the State Department, does not have oil on its list of issues, a department spokesman said last week. An official with the National Security Council declined to say whether oil had been discussed during consultations on Iraq that Bush has had over the past several weeks with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Western leaders.

On Friday, a State Department delegation concluded a three-day visit to Moscow in connection with Iraq. In early October, U.S. and Russian officials are to hold an energy summit in Houston, at which more than 100 Russian and American energy companies are expected.

Rep. Curt Weldon (R–Pa.) said Bush is keenly aware of Russia's economic interests in Iraq, stemming from a $7 billion to $8 billion debt that Iraq ran up with Moscow before the Gulf War. Weldon, who has cultivated close ties to Putin and Russian parliamentarians, said he believed the Russian leader will support U.S. action in Iraq if he can get private assurances from Bush that Russia "will be made whole" financially.

Officials of the Iraqi National Congress said last week that the INC's Washington director, Entifadh K. Qanbar, met with Russian Embassy officials here last month and urged Moscow to begin a dialogue with opponents of Hussein's government.

But even with such groundwork, the chances of a tidy transition in the oil sector appear highly problematic. Rival ethnic groups in Iraq's north are already squabbling over the the giant Kirkuk oil field, which Arabs, Kurds and minority Turkmen tribesmen are eyeing in the event of Hussein's fall.

Although the volumes have dwindled in recent months, the United States was importing nearly 1 million barrels of Iraqi oil a day at the start of the year. Even so, American oil companies have been banished from direct involvement in Iraq since the late 1980s, when relations soured between Washington and Baghdad.

Hussein in the 1990s turned to non-American companies to repair fields damaged in the Gulf War and Iraq's earlier war against Iran, and to tap undeveloped reserves, but U.S. government studies say the results have been disappointing.

While Russia's Lukoil negotiated a $4 billion deal in 1997 to develop the 15-billion-barrel West Qurna field in southern Iraq, Lukoil had not commenced work because of U.N sanctions. Iraq has threatened to void the agreement unless work began immediately.

Last October, the Russian oil services company Slavneft reportedly signed a $52 million service contract to drill at the Tuba field, also in southern Iraq. A proposed $40 billion Iraqi-Russian economic agreement also reportedly includes opportunities for Russian companies to explore for oil in Iraq's western desert.

The French company Total Fina Elf has negotiated for rights to develop the huge Majnoon field, near the Iranian border, which may contain up to 30 billion barrels of oil. But in July 2001, Iraq announced it would no longer give French firms priority in the award of such contracts because of its decision to abide by the sanctions.

Officials of several major firms said they were taking care to avoiding playing any role in the debate in Washington over how to proceed on Iraq. "There's no real upside for American oil companies to take a very aggressive stance at this stage. There'll be plenty of time in the future," said James Lucier, an oil analyst with Prudential Securities.

But with the end of sanctions that likely would come with Hussein's ouster, companies such as ExxonMobil and ChevronTexaco would almost assuredly play a role, industry officials said. "There's not an oil company out there that wouldn't be interested in Iraq," one analyst said.

Staff writer Ken Bredemeier contributed to this report.

WAR FEVER: BUSH, CHENEY WON'T STOP

The White House continues its mantra that war is necessary because Saddam is "evil" and he's secretly making weapons of mass destruction. But this justification may be a smoke screen. Some observers say the administration's hidden motive is to gain control of Iraq's oil.

In a front-page Sunday report subtitled "U.S. Drillers Eye Huge Petroleum Pool," The Washington Post said America's oil industry—to which Bush and Cheney are closely tied—eagerly wants a "regime change" in Iraq so U.S. firms can begin drilling into Iraq's vast, 112-billion-barrel reserve.

The White House supports the London-based Iraqi National Congress, an umbrella organization of exiled Iraqi groups seeking to remove Saddam. INC leader Ahmed Chalabi told the Post that, when a new regime is installed in Baghdad, "American companies will have a big shot at Iraqi oil."

"It's pretty straightforward. France and Russia have oil companies and interests in Iraq. They should be told that if they are of assistance in moving Iraq toward decent government, we'll do the best we can to ensure that the new government and American companies work closely with them."

Amazing. This implies that Bush's war urge isn't about "evil" or weapons. It's about oil.

Atlanta Journal-Constitution columnist Cynthia Tucker said the White House war demands are "tainted with the sickening smell of gasoline."

"If the Bush administration invades Iraq," she wrote, "future scholars will look back on this period and name the period for what it was: the Petroleum Wars. . . . What but oil could possibly explain the Bush administration's stubborn insistence on attacking Suddam Hussein, who had no connection to the atrocities of Sept. 11?"

Sen. Robert C. Byrd, D–W.Va., has taken the lead in questioning President Bush's war plans.

We hope that he and colleagues in Congress try to learn whether the White House war cry is designed to serve America's oil industry.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The senior assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Hearing no objection, the quorum call will be terminated.

The Senator from Florida, Mr. NELSON.

IRAQ AND HOMELAND DEFENSE

Mr. NELSON of Florida. I thank the President pro tempore for the recognition, and I thank the Senator from West Virginia, who just delivered a very insightful statement of why the Constitution must be protected and not shredded, why the Constitution must be adhered to in a protection of the carefully constructed separation of powers which gives us the checks and balances that have allowed this Government to endure for well over two centuries, to be the strong Government it is because, as a great British statesman once said: Power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

In the 1780s, when those political geniuses gathered to construct a document upon which this new Nation could be based and the delicate checks and balances were entered, as well as the spirit of compromise in that Constitutional Convention, they set off one branch of Government from the other.

Thus, as we come to this very serious determination of what to do in Iraq, we have to be mindful of the Constitution and its separation of powers. Clearly, the Constitution gives that awesome and very weighty responsibility of declaring war to the legislative branch of Government. There was a reason for that: So that no Executive would go off on a whim or on ill advice and start war but, rather, that the representatives of the people in this body and the body at the other end of the U.S. Capitol would be involved in that decisionmaking and, in fact, would make that decision and then reflect the will of the people.

I thank the Senator from West Virginia for a very cogent and timely statement.

There is trouble in the Middle East and central Asia. I have been to Afghanistan twice since the first of the year. I have been to Pakistan twice. I have been to India. I have been in the middle of that situation, urging the leaders of India and Pakistan to reduce the tensions on the Kashmir border because the last thing the world needs is an exchange of nuclear weapons. Particularly, that would hurt us because both of those countries are helping us in our war against terrorism.

I have been to the Middle East, and that is a troubled part of the world. As we approach this most momentous and solemn occasion about whether or not, in effect, to declare war by giving the President of the United States the authority for the expenditure of funds to conduct such a war, we must be mindful, and the questions must be answered:

What will a war in Iraq do to our war against terrorism? Will it be hurt? Will it be helped? Will our war against terrorism be set aside? Will our attempt to cut off the head of the snake that operates the al-Qaida machine be deterred in any way?

What will happen to the flow of oil out of that region of the world to the industrialized world?

What is the number of troops that is going to be required?

How likely are the casualties, and how many American lives can we expect to lose.

How many troops are we going to have to hold in reserve? Fighting door to door in downtown Baghdad is going to be a different kind of war, and I do not think we can go into Iraq assuming that the opposition is suddenly going to melt away and that the army is going to step forth and suddenly lay down its arms.

I personally believe that Saddam Hussein has chemical and biological weapons, and I personally think he is trying to develop nuclear weapons. If he, in fact, has chemical and biological weapons, will our troops be prepared if those weapons of mass destruction are utilized against our troops or utilized against any of the neighbors in the region?

Are we going to be able to approach a war in Iraq with our allies solidly behind us? There is an election going on right now in Germany, and that certainly does not seem to be the political talk in Germany. Germany is one of our closest allies.

There is also an election going on right now in Turkey, our very substantial ally. That election is in November. With the talk of war, with the imminent possibility of war, how much of a possibility is there that the election would throw to a religious party the opportunity to govern Turkey instead of the secular government that has given such stability, particularly military stability, in that part of the world?

Then the question arises, which I had the opportunity to ask the Secretary of Defense yesterday in the Armed Services Committee, what about after there has been the regime change? Is it going to be a regime that would be friendly to the United States? Would Iraq be kept intact, or would it be ripped asunder?—I might say, to the chagrin of our ally Turkey. What is the plan for the United States to be involved for the long term in Iraq, militarily and economically? We saw that in the phenomenal military success we had in Afghanistan—mostly success; some not so successful, such as Tora Bora. We saw that in the midst of all of that success, in a much different situation, the hard reality, after the fact, that the United States is going to need to be a military and economic presence in Afghanistan for a very long time.

Otherwise, if we leave, it will be like when we left in the late 1980s. After the Soviets got whipped, they tucked their tail between their legs and left, and we, assisting the victors, also left; it created a vacuum, and that vacuum was filled by the terrorists.

So in any post-Saddam Hussein Iraq, it is going to take a lot of effort and time and resources by the United States, and I want to see the administration spell that out clearly, as the Secretary of Defense started to do yesterday in response to my question. There is a lot of detail to be filled in.

It brings us to another question. We have in front of the Senate this question of homeland defense, and there is not one of us in this Chamber who does not want to have a reorganization of the Government so one hand knows better what the other hand is doing, so one hand knows better how we can coordinate, and a reorganization of the Government can achieve that. In the process, let's not overdo ourselves where we take away worker protections, where we strip apart agencies such as the Coast Guard, which is a necessary part of the homeland defense. The Coast Guard has a lot of other duties to perform. Particularly, if one comes from a State such as mine that has such tremendous coastline, the Coast Guard performs innumerable functions not only of search and rescue but of drug interdiction, and of course their duties have been heightened so much now on port security.

So, as we approach homeland defense, we have a great number of decisions to make about which we had better be cautious. Otherwise, going back to my initial comments of commendation for the Senator from West Virginia and his comments about Iraq and concern about the Constitution being shredded with regard to an invasion of Iraq, so, too, we have concerns about the Constitution not being obeyed by the Congress performing its appropriate legislative role as a check and a balance, as an overseer, as an appropriator of the funds, for this new Department that is to be created.

I offer these comments today, and I thank the Senator from West Virginia for his very insightful comments. It is always a pleasure to listen and to learn from the Senator from West Virginia.

I yield the floor, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The senior assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. President, I have had the pleasure of describing some of my concerns with regard to the possible invasion of Iraq and also the knitting together of the most massive reorganization of the Federal Government over the last half century and the creation of a new Department of Homeland Defense. This is a massive undertaking. It involves some 170,000 people. It involves scores of agencies, with an annual $38 billion budget.

Implied in my remarks is the urging of caution as we approach the creation of this agency. One of the items to be discussed in the Senate at a future time will be an amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia to take a cautious and deliberative approach in knitting together this massive agency. The directorates would be set up under the legislation right away, but their implementation would occur over the course of 13 months. It would be done on a phased-in basis, in which the Congress would be consulted as it is phased in, where there would be time to make sure in the example that I have given earlier about the Coast Guard functions other than the homeland security function that, in fact, the Coast Guard would not be deterred from its multiple service roles.

It is a wise approach the Senator from West Virginia has brought to the table in slowing down the process. I hope our colleagues will see the wisdom of protecting the separation of powers as provided in the Constitution, and the wisdom of us being sure that instead of their being such a mass of confusion in a reorganization all at once, that it would be done in a deliberative and phased-in approach.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator have an additional 5 minutes, and that the previous order be extended for an additional 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CLINTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I thank the Senator from Florida for his perspicacious remarks. He has not been asleep. He has been ill with a temporary ailment, but he is back on the mend. He is ready to go.

I also thank my friend for his expression of support for my amendment. That amendment will be voted on next Tuesday. It will be voted up or down. Senators will have an opportunity to go on record, if they support that amendment, an opportunity to support the creation of a Department of Homeland Defense. In voting for my amendment, they will have an opportunity to say that we are not going to hand this whole package of homeland security as it is envisioned in the House or Senate bill. I refer to the Senate bill as the Lieberman bill.

Once the Senate passes on the homeland security bill, then the Senate bill would go to the conference. The conference report eventually would come back to both Houses, and the Senate will not have an opportunity on the conference report to amend. All the Senate will be able to do is vote up or down on the conference report.

Under the House bill or under the Lieberman bill, the overall time certainly under the Lieberman bill, the overall period for the "fleshing out" of this Department of Homeland Security, this fleshing out by moving various and sundry agencies and offices into the several directorates that are established by the Lieberman bill, and the five directorates that are mentioned in my amendment thereto, that fleshing out would occur under the Lieberman bill over a period of 13 months.

But in passing the Lieberman bill, and it is light-years ahead of the House bill, it is a better bill than the House bill, but it can be improved. That is what I am attempting to do with my amendment. Under the Lieberman bill, over a period of 13 months, Congress will be putting itself on the sidelines.

The Senate will be saying: OK, Mr. President, it is all yours. You have 13 months. Congress is going fishing. You have it. It is all yours.

Now, nothing would please this President more than to have such a blank check handed to him. The Lieberman bill, in that respect, is a Tonkin Gulf resolution on homeland security. Congress will be removing itself to the sidelines for those 13 months, and the President and this administration—think about that carefully—with its penchant for secrecy, its penchant for operating out of the White House, having no limitations, will have full authority to move agencies and 170,000 employees into this new department, with Congress relegating itself to the sidelines.

The hand of Congress ought to be there. Congress ought to conduct its constitutional responsibility of oversight in seeing that these agencies are put into the various directorates in an orderly way throughout the 13 months. The Lieberman committee and its counterpart in the House under my amendment would be front and center throughout the 13 months. That committee would still be in the driver's seat, and every 4 months there would be another shift of agencies and directorates, every 4 months, until it is completed, over a 13-month period.

All the while, Mr. LIEBERMAN's committee would take the policies and the recommendations of the Secretary of Homeland Security, look at them, debate them in the committee, amend them, and report the legislation to the Senate, and then the Senate would take the legislation, report it from the Lieberman committee, and debate it, amend it, send it to the President.

I have said we could have expedited procedure. I am not a Senator who likes expedited procedure, but in this situation I would be willing to have expedited procedures to see that the bill doesn't fall through the cracks in the committee, and that it is not filibustered or delayed in the Senate.

That is my prescription, my amendment for order: a phased filling out of the department by agencies and offices, under continuing congressional oversight, avoiding the chaos that will otherwise occur just by handing this whole thing over to the President and the administration—hook, line, and sinker. Just mark my words. I am seeking to improve the Lieberman bill. I am not adversarial to the Lieberman bill. But if we don't adopt my amendment, or something like it, there is going to be chaos, and instead of having a measure that will promote the security of our homeland and its people, we will be taking our eyes off the terrorists, off homeland security.

The federal agencies are out there, working now to provide homeland security. The passage of the Lieberman bill is not necessary in order to get these people out there guarding the ports of entry—the rivers and seaports and airports and the southern and northern borders. They are already out there working now, every day. The FBI, just a few days ago, in the State of New York, located a cell and arrested six persons. Did the FBI have to wait on this homeland security bill? There is no great outcry out there in the country; there is no great clamor for a homeland security bill. When I go to West Virginia, people don't come up to me and say: Senator, let's get that homeland security bill passed. When are you going to pass that bill? There is no great clamor out there. As a matter of fact, it is hard to get anyone to listen to a discussion of the subject.

I have been on this Senate floor time and time again, asking to be heard. Listen. Hear me. Why, the Members of the Senate aren't that greatly interested in this bill. Facing us in less than 2 months is a big election. All of a sudden this administration, which as late as the middle of August has been saying that there were "no plans on the President's desk" to go to war with Iraq. I asked the Secretary of State that question in a committee hearing: oh, there is "no plan. The President doesn't have any plan on his desk." I asked the Secretary of Defense. Oh, the President has no plans. The President himself has been quoted time and time again saying he has no plans; "there is no plan on my desk."

All of a sudden, bam, the administration wants to go to war with Iraq. It wasn't too long ago, I can remember the Secretary's public spokesman and Ari Fleischer and some others in the administration, saying: "Why have a Department of Homeland Defense? We don't need one." That wasn't long ago. But all of a sudden, all of a sudden the President was dropping in the polls and the domestic situation was such that the administration was appearing to be much like the Emperor who had no clothes. All of a sudden, bam, all of this war talk—the war fervor, the drums of war, the bugles of war, the clouds of war—this war hysteria has blown in like a hurricane. And what has that done to the President's polls? Seventy percent.

Don't tell me that things suddenly went wrong. I sat in on some of the secret briefings and nobody from the administration in those secret briefings has been able to answer the question: Why now? Why all of a sudden, when the administration was saying back just in August the President has no plans? Let's not have all of this angst about war.

All of a sudden this country is going to war. And the President is saying, I'll do this if the U.N. doesn't do it.

Now, all of a sudden, is the Administration talking about the domestic situation in this country? Are they talking about the stock market? Are they talking about the weakness of the economy? Are they talking about the jobs that are being lost? Are they talking about the decrease in housing starts in this country? No. No.

The war clouds are there. All of a sudden this administration sends up a resolution to Congress that is a nonstarter, to give this President the authority that he is asking for. Not by this Constitution will I give my vote on that resolution. That resolution is going to take some work. But all of a sudden? Why is it? Is it politics?

The Constitution is apparently irrelevant to people in this administration. What is wanted here by the administration is for Congress, in connection with war, to do the same as they want Congress to do in homeland security—hand over the whole authority and say: Take it, Mr. President. It's all yours for the next 13 months. Congress is going fishing. We are not going to be in the mix. Congress relegates itself to the sidelines.

How foolish can we be as Members of the Senate to tuck our tails between our legs and just quit and say: "You can have it all, Mr. President. Do anything you want to do with homeland security." Well, not by my vote.

I thank the distinguished Senator for his remarks.

Madam President, I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The senior assistant bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mrs. CLINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded and the time for morning business be extended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection to the calling off of the quorum, further proceedings under the call are waived.

Did the Senator have a further request?

Mrs. CLINTON. That the time for morning business be extended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. For how many minutes would the Senator suggest?

Mrs. CLINTON. Ten minutes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from New York is recognized.

THANKING SENATOR BYRD

Mrs. CLINTON. Mr. President, I express my appreciation, and I know the appreciation of many of our colleagues, for the Chair's steadfast defense of the Constitution and for his reminder to constant all of us, that the Senate, being the premier deliberative body in the world and, as he often says, one of two such great deliberative Senates ever to be seen by history, has an important role to play in ensuring that the decisions that are made today will stand the test of time and will be made in concert with our constitutional framework and our obligations as Senators.

THREE GREAT CHALLENGES FACING OUR NATION

Mrs. CLINTON. Mr. President, in the recent colloquy and discussion that the Senator from West Virginia, our current Chair, had with the Senator from Florida, many important issues were raised about homeland security and how best to pursue the defense of our homeland.

I don't think anyone argues we now face three great challenges in our Nation. First, we have a national security challenge. Our men and women in uniform are addressing that challenge even as we speak—all over the world from Afghanistan to the Persian Gulf to the border of North and South Korea, and many other places as well. All of us support our military and have voted to provide the largest appropriations ever in our history to give our men and women who put themselves in harm's way all of the resources, technology and compensations that our great military deserves.

We have a new challenge; that is, the challenge of homeland security. Certainly, many of us have not had to think of this issue as we are now.

On September 11 of last year when we were so grievously attacked, it became clear that we had to begin to apply the techniques of security much closer to home that we have used to defend America's interests abroad for so many generations. We have to take a very hard look at our vulnerabilities, our infrastructure, our borders, and our public health capacity to deal with biological or chemical warfare. And it requires every one of us—not just those in elective office but every citizen—to become more vigilant and to understand that we are truly facing some serious threats.

At the same time, though, there is no reason for us not to debate the best way to defend ourselves. In every generation of America, we have had great debates about how to fight wars and how to structure our national security. Now we are having a debate about how to deal with the new demands of homeland security.

I applaud the Chair for his absolutely rock-solid commitment, his totally uncynical and heartfelt commitment to make sure we do this right. It is a huge undertaking. Are we being asked to merge departments just so somebody can say we did something or are we going to do it right? It is the right of patriotism to ask hard questions. That is who we are as Americans. We are not people who are blindly led. We are not sheep who follow any leader's oratory. We are an independent, free-spirited, liberty-loving people.

When we have debates, either on the floor of the Senate or in the media, about the right way to proceed, those of us who engage in that debate do so out of a deep wellspring of love and devotion to our country. No one exemplifies that more than the senior Senator from West Virginia.

In addition to our national security challenges and our homeland security challenges, we have all of the challenges we had on September 10 of last year. We have an economy that is stalled. We have a so-called "jobless recovery." We can't seem to come together on important issues.

I am delighted to see my colleague from Arizona in the Chamber. Senator MCCAIN has been a leader and advocate for prescription drugs and for patients getting the right to have the treatment their doctors prescribe—not an HMO or some bureaucrat somewhere.

There are many important issues we should be debating that also will determine the quality of our life and the opportunities for our children.

I hope, as people tune in to see what happens on the Senate floor—when they see the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Arizona taking to the floor to talk about an issue—that they recognize that we believe we are acting in the great tradition, not only of the American Senate and Congress, but of America's citizenry, because there isn't any greater title than one can have than citizen of the United States of America.

I, as one Senator, appreciate the Senator's vigilance, his constant reminder to the rest of us that we are here because of our Founders, their genius, and the Constitution which they bequeathed to us. The debates we are holding on this important issue of national homeland security and other pressing domestic issues are in the tradition of those Founders.

I thank the Chair. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona, Mr. MCCAIN.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I ask for the forbearance of the distinguished

President pro tempore and ask unanimous consent that we extend morning business by about 5 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York for her kind words about our efforts towards addressing some of the important issues of the day. I thank her.

CONDITION IN GEORGIA

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, despite America's preponderant role in the world, it is not often that foreign leaders tell us that their country would not exist as an independent state were it not for U.S. support. Yet leaders across the spectrum in the former Soviet republic of Georgia, including President Eduard Shevardnadze and his political opponents, frankly and gratefully attribute their national survival to unstinting American support since their independence from Soviet rule eleven years ago. In a troubling display of how history does not always move in a positive direction, Georgia's independence is once again under threat, with repercussions that should concern all who cherish freedom.

In an opportunistic twist of President Bush's policy of pre-emption against clear and present dangers to America and the world, President Putin of Russia has appropriated American rhetoric in the war on terrorism to justify Russian subversion of the Georgian state. A free Russian hand in Georgia is apparently the price President Putin believes the United States is willing to pay for Russia's support for military action against Iraq. President Bush and the Congress of the United States should disabuse our friends in Moscow of this illusion, immediately.

President Putin rode to power on promises to defeat Chechen separatists in Russia's south. Reports indicate that members of Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups operate in Chechnya. Russia has a right and an obligation to bring these legitimate terrorists to justice. But rather than targeting them and their Chechen comrades in arms, Russian forces have conducted a military campaign of astonishing brutality against Chechnya's civilian population as leaders in the West have looked the other way.

At the same time, Presidents Bush and Putin have brought about a historic change in U.S.-Russia relations that is moving our two nations from rivalry to strategic partnership. We in the United States welcome this development. But there can be no true partnership absent Russian commitment to the fundamental values that guide American policy in these areas.

I believe President Putin has indeed made a historic decision to align his country with the West as Russia moves away from its imperial past and towards a democratic, prosperous future. Yet Russia's threat to Georgia, like Russia's brutality in Chechnya, calls to mind a discredited, imperial past whose resurgence threatens the transformation in U.S.-Russian relations and, in particular, our joint commitment to eradicating the networks of global terror that threaten both our peoples.

Seized by the domestic political costs of a grinding war in Chechnya that Russia cannot win militarily, and calculating that President Bush's doctrine of pre-emption somehow applies to both a megalomaniacal tyrant like Saddam Hussein and a democratically oriented, pro-Western leader like Eduard Shevardnadze, President Putin has sent Russian jets to bomb targets in Georgia. Putin openly outlines his plans for a Russian invasion of Georgia to wipe out terrorism there. Motivated by a deep dislike of President Shevardnadze, whom they blame for the Soviet Union's disintegration and who has been targeted for assassination by figures linked to Moscow, and tempted by visions of Russian control over Russia's oil-rich Near Abroad, some Russian leaders seem to believe the impunity Russia has enjoyed in Chechnya would carry over to Russian military operations against its sovereign neighbor. They are wrong.

Russia's civilian and military leadership must know that our growing, and welcome, strategic partnership in the war on terror does not sanction unilateral Russian military adventurism for purposes whose relation to the war on terror is incidental. Moscow, and Washington, and Tbilisi are right to be alarmed by continuing reports that Chechen militants and members of al-Qaida have taken refuge in Georgia's lawless Pankisi Gorge. America's proper response was to deploy American Special Forces teams to Georgia to train and equip Georgian security forces to take control of the gorge and enforce Georgian control over its territory.

President Shevardnadze has announced a major Georgian military operation, with U.S. military advisors, to root out terrorists in Pankisi. International monitors are already stationed along Georgia's border with Chechnya, and President Shevardnadze has proposed expanding this monitoring force to prevent militants from finding refuge in Georgia in the future. Shevardnadze yesterday pledged to extradite 13 men that Russia says are Chechen guerrillas captured by Georgian security officials.

The United States and Russia, in the spirit of strategic partnership both countries profess, have a willing partner in President Shevardnadze to eliminate any terrorist presence in Georgia that Moscow correctly perceives to threaten its interests. But Russia has rejected Georgia's candid, and unprecedented, proposals to cooperate in eradicating terrorism. Instead, Russia seems to want to use the terrorist problem as a means of reasserting Russian control in Georgia, which already suffers the presence of three Russian military bases and separatist conflicts supported by Moscow.

Some in Moscow do not understand that unilateral and preemptive Russian military operations in Georgia make the situation worse, not better. These operations threaten to turn Russia's desire to root out a small group of terrorists into an international crisis that threatens what President Putin cherishes—a robust partnership with the West that he has defined as Russia's future.

It is unacceptable and immoral for any American leader to countenance Russia's increasingly open campaign for control of its neighbor to the south—which is why no American leader will do so. But pressure from Moscow works in insidious ways. One "senior Administration official" recently told the New York Times, "Looking now at the new strategic circumstances, I think there may be some rethinking about how we handle the Georgian situation. I think there's a recognition the Russian government has a legitimate security concern."

The United States properly shares Russia's concern about foreign terrorists seeking refuge in Georgia, and can surely find a way to advance our mutual interest in helping Georgia end incursions by these people. But giving Russia carte blanche to impose its own solution—as it has, brutally, in Chechnya—would be a repudiation of the values we are fighting the war on terror to defend and the celebration of freedom that took place in Georgia and across the former Soviet Union when imperial rule crumbled.

Strengthening the Georgian Government's capacity to control parts of its own country and working with American and Georgian officials to eliminate terrorists from Georgian territory, on terms acceptable to the Georgian Government, is an interest Moscow shares with Washington and Tbilisi. It is one we can advance together, in the spirit of partnership that characterizes our cooperation in the war on terrorism—not in the spirit of rivalry and spheres of influence that recall an unpleasant past.

Leaders in Moscow must know that no nation has a greater stake in wiping out al-Qaida's global terror network than the United States. We would never countenance any Georgian actions to wink at terrorism within its borders; indeed, our deployment of American Special Forces to Georgia is a measure of the seriousness with which we take the threat terrorists pose to Georgia and the region. In the same way, President Putin and those around him must know that we cannot countenance unilateral Russian military action that puts Georgia's independence at risk. I hope President Putin will make the choice that befits his role as an enlightened leader of the Russian people, and does not cast his lot with the officers and civilians around him who believe Russian can assert imperial control over a sovereign neighbor without consequence. There will be consequences—and no friend of Russia or Georgia should suggest otherwise.

(Mrs. CLINTON assumed the Chair.)

Mr. McCAIN. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that a Wall Street Journal editorial of September 16, 2002, entitled "Putin's Iraq Price" a September 19, 2002, editorial in the Washington Post, entitled "A Parody Of Partnership" and an editorial from the Economist magazine of September 21, 2002, entitled "Putin's folly" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUTIN'S IRAQ PRICE

One danger of President's Bush's otherwise successful overture to the United Nations on Iraq is the price the U.S. will have to pay to win Security Council approval. Russian President Vladimir Putin has already submitted his bill, requesting a global wink at military intervention in what used to be Soviet Georgia.

Even as the U.N. was still digesting Mr. Bush's speech last Friday, Mr. Putin appropriated the language of U.S. policy to justify his Georgian meddling. He accuses his southern neighbor of harboring Chechen rebels and others he calls terrorists, and the bold Russian hopes Mr. Bush will give him a pass in return for approving action against Iraq. This is an offer we hope the U.S. refuses, not least so it can begin better defining just what the new Bush "pre-emption" doctrine means.

For starters Mr. Putin's analogy is preposterous. Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze is not only not another Saddam Hussein, he is one of the more enlightened leaders of the new countries that were once part of the former Soviet Union. He hasn't tried to acquire nuclear weapons or plotted to assassinate a U.S. President, much less invaded a neighbor, gassed his own people or ignored 16 U.N. resolutions.

On the contrary, Mr. Shevardnadze's main problem is that he has charted a pro-Western foreign policy that irritates some of his former Soviet colleagues in Moscow. He has already survived several assassination attempts, with the chief suspect in one case finding safe haven in Russia. He has fought a separatist war against Abkhaz rebels trained and funded by Russia. Russia still has three military bases in Georgia and has defied orders from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to vacate its base in Abkhazia and negotiate withdrawal from the others.

Mr. Shevardnadze is understandably keen not to give his big neighbor any excuse to intervene militarily. In response to Russia's latest saber-rattling, he has beefed up border security and invited monitors into Georgia to testify to his country's anti-terror efforts. U.S. special forces are already helping train and equip the Georgian military to root out rebels from Chechnya, a Russian republic on its northern border.

All of which suggests the need for Mr. Bush to elaborate on his pre-emption doctrine. We support this policy as necessary in a world in which madmen who control countries can get nuclear weapons; "non intervention" in the internal affairs of such countries is no longer a safe strategy. But the critics have a point that without some clarifying distinctions, the doctrine of preventive action can be abused by countries looking to settle old scores or grab new territory. Drawing a line between peaceful Georgia and Iraq—ruled by a lunatic dictator who traffics with terrorists and seeks nuclear weapons—would be a useful first step.

On Friday U.S. Undersecretary of State John Bolton began to take that step by saying the U.S. "opposes any unilateral military action by Russia" inside Georgia. He added that "I don't see that there are really any quid pro quos to be had" over Iraq, "whether with Russia or others."

We hope that view holds inside the Bush Administration, even as Russian pressure inevitably increases. Agreeing to Mr. Putin's Georgian price would be damaging to U.S. interests, and isn't necessary in any case. It would set a precedent for Russian action in oil-rich Central Asia, emboldening Russian nationalists to meddle next in Azerbaijan and elsewhere. It would also be dishonorable, abandoning a man in Mr. Shevardnadze who helped bring the Cold War to a peaceful end as the Soviet foreign minister under Mikhail Gorbachev.

It's doubtful that Mr. Putin will want to block U.S. action against Iraq in any event. Siding with Saddam would only undermine the worthy efforts he has made so far to build confidence in Russia as a political and business partner of the West. His overstretched military is already bleeding in Chechnya, and the last thing he needs is a ground war in neighboring Georgia. Using Iraq as cover for more meddling in impoverished Caucasus would only recall memories of Soviet imperialism.

Mr. Bush began to turn would opinion on Iraq last week not merely because he went to the U.N. but mainly because of the rightness of his cause. The U.S. can carry the day in Iraq without sacrificing its principles by catering to Mr. Putin's nationalist opportunism.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 19, 2002]

A PARODY OF PARTNERSHIP

Vladimir Putin, the soul-baring friend of President Bush, is offering another demonstration of why the administration's flighty rhetoric about the "transformation" of U.S.-Russian relations has been premature. Mr. Putin's government is doing its best to hamstring Mr. Bush's campaign against Iraq; the Russian ambassador at the United Nations rushed to embrace Saddam Hussein's transparently tactical acceptance of weapons inspectors and declared that no further action by the Security Council was needed. Meanwhile, Mr. Putin himself is peddling a grotesque parody of Mr. Bush's principled stand on both Iraq and Afghanistan: Last week he informed the Security Council, in terms that deliberately echoed Mr. Bush, that the war on terrorism may require a unilateral Russian attack on the small neighboring nation of Georgia, a former republic of the Soviet Union that infuriates Moscow merely by existing as an independent, democratic and pro-Western state. This stunningly brazen attempt to cloak an old-fashioned threat of military aggression in Mr. Bush's new doctrine of preemption has been accompanied by an even more cynical suggestion of quid pro quo: Allow Russian to crush Georgian sovereignty, Mr. Putin hints, and he just might acquiesce in the enforcement of the U.N.-ordered disarmament of Iraq. Bush administration officials are saying they won't play Mr. Putin's game; the White House needs to make that point unambiguously this week to Mr. Putin's visiting defense and foreign ministers.

The nominal basis for Mr. Putin's threat to Georgia, a country the size of South Carolina with a mostly Christian population of 5 million, is that it is tolerating the presence of Muslim rebel fighters from the neighboring Russian province of Chechnya. Mr. Putin insists that these are terrorists, indistinguishable from al Qaeda, and that Georgia is allowing them to operate training camps and pass freely across the border. In fact the insurgents are almost all ethnic Chechens fighting for self-rule who take refuge during summer in the Pankisi Gorge, a wild, 11-mile-long strip that has long been lawless. The Bush administration contends that some al Qaeda operatives may be present in the Pankisi, but evidence is scant. In any case, the Georgian government clearly has no interest in backing al Qaeda terrorists, or even the Chechens; it has readily accepted an ongoing U.S. training programing for its army, and it recently dispatched 1,000 troops to clear out the Pankisi. President Eduard Shevardnadze has asked to meet with Mr. Putin and invited international monitoring of the border area; this week his administration agreed to extradite 13 suspects Russia says are Chechen guerrillas.

These initiatives are not enough for Mr. Putin: His generals say they are readying a cross-border invasion, following up on airstrikes carried out last month. It's not likely that Russian forces, which have failed to control Chechen movements across their own border, could eliminate or even locate any militants in the Pankisi. But that's not Mr. Putin's real aim. His goals are to distract attention from a recent series of military disasters in Chechnya—incidents that have revived discussion in Russia about the futility of Mr. Putin's campaign to suppress the rebellion by force—and to use the leverage of Russia's U.N. Security Council vote on Iraq to achieve suzerainty over Georgia, which Moscow has been seeking since long before the war on terrorism. This is not the behavior of a soul mate, or even a "strategic partner"; and a U.S.-Russian relationship afflicted by such tactics has not been transformed.

[From the Economist, Sept. 21, 2002]

PUTIN'S FOLLY

Those who write speeches for Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, no doubt imagine they are good students of American foreign policy. They seem determined to copy, or rather caricature, every new American idea. They no doubt had a hand, too, in drafting the stern letter that Mr. Putin sent to the United Nations, laying out his case for intervention in neighbouring Georgia unless its government clears its territory of a group of Chechen terrorists who have holed up there.

Like America in Iraq, his officials claim, Russia is insisting on its right to take military action, alone if necessary, against a nation which it deems to be in breach of international law; like America in Afghanistan,

> Russia justifies itself by recalling that failed states can be a source of festering security threats. Like George Bush, Mr. Putin is merely proposing to act pre-emptively, in extremis, against a state that poses a deadly and increasing danger. Indeed, regime change cannot be ruled out.
>
> A mixture of all these arguments has been used by Mr. Putin and his lieutenants to justify their recent and repeated threats of military action against Georgia—some air raids have already taken place, say the Georgians, and Russians have been hinting darkly that a land attack may follow. The Georgians stand accused of posing a threat to Russian security because they cannot or will not take effective action against the Chechen fighters, possibly allied with Islamist extremists from elsewhere, who have set up camp in the remote Pankisi gorge. If you cannot solve the problem—and guarantee that no attacks on Russian territory will be launched from Georgian territory—then we will, is the Kremlin's message. The Russian media, meanwhile, have mounted an escalating series of personal attacks on Georgia's president, Edward Shevardnadze. The clear implication is that nobody in Moscow would shed a tear if, in the turmoil caused by a Russian attack, the leadership of Georgia were to change hands.
>
> If there is not a grain of truth in Russia's arguments, it lies in the fact that Georgia, while not a failed state, is one that has had difficulty asserting its authority in its border areas. Indeed in two of its regions—Abkhazia and South Ossetia—the writ of the Tbilisi government does not run at all. Even in other places, it struggles to collect taxes and enforce the law. This is a dangerous state of affairs; where the rule of law is absent, smugglers in drugs, guns and even deadlier things fill the void.
>
> THE MOTE IN RUSSIA'S EYE
>
> But there is also a huge flaw in Russia's argument. If the Georgian state functions less than perfectly—in Pankisi and elsewhere—that is in large part because Russia itself has consistently undermined it. The restive mini-states within Georgia's legal boundaries (Abkhazia, South Ossetia and, to some extent, Ajaria in the south-west) defy the government with the help of powerful friends in Moscow.
>
> By sending 150 or so military advisers to Georgia, America is attempting to bolster the country's security forces. But even that programme has been undermined by Georgian officers with connections in Russia. If Russians are concerned about the security of their southern frontier, they would do better to reinforce Georgia's statehood rather than chip away at it. Georgia is neither a rogue state, nor (as yet) a failed one. Nor do Georgians need outsiders to orchestrate regime change for them. Imitation is a form of flattery, but other should not be duped into seeing parallels where none exist.

Mr. McCAIN. Madam President, all three of these editorials I have asked to be printed in the RECORD talk about the danger we are now experiencing concerning Mr. Putin's actions, or possible actions, in Georgia.

The Economist magazine editorial says:

It says:

> If there is one grain of truth in Russia's arguments, it lies in the fact that Georgia, while not a failed state, is one that has had difficulty asserting its authority in its border areas. . . .
>
> But there is also a huge flaw in Russia's argument. If the Georgian state functions less than perfectly—in Pankisi and elsewhere—that is in large part because Russia itself has consistently undermined it. The restive mini-states within Georgia's legal boundaries . . . defy the government with the help of powerful friends in Moscow. . . .
>
> If Russians are concerned about the security of their southern frontier, they would do better to reinforce Georgia's statehood rather than chip away at it. Georgia is neither a rogue state, nor (as yet) a failed one. Nor do Georgians need outsiders to orchestrate regime change for them. Imitation is a form of flattery, but others should not be duped into seeing parallels where none exist.

> His goals are to distract attention from a recent series of military disasters in Chechnya—incidents that have revived discussion in Russia about the futility of Mr. Putin's campaign to suppress the rebellion by force—and to use the leverage of Russia's U.N. Security Council vote on Iraq to achieve suzerainty over Georgia, which Moscow has been seeking since long before the war on terrorism. This is not the behavior of a soul mate, or even a "strategic partner"; and a U.S.-Russian relationship afflicted by such tactics has not been transformed.

Madam President, I thank the Presiding Officer for her patience. I do believe this is an important issue. I hope our Russian friends, with whom we have a very strong relationship, will not embark on an adventure which could have serious repercussions not only in the region but in the world.

I thank you, Madam President, and yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE AGENDA

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I have had a discussion with Senator LOTT with regard to next week's schedule. I have indicated privately to a number of Senators my concern for the legislative agenda we must confront prior to the time we leave. That agenda includes a number of issues that have support on both sides of the aisle. It recognizes that we have been on the homeland security bill now for 3 full weeks and the Interior appropriations bill for an equal amount of time. I am increasingly concerned that the longer we stay on those bills, the less likely it is that we will be able to adjourn on time.

Given that realization, my expectation is that we will require colleagues to be here at least possibly as early as next weekend to confront this agenda and to complete our work. I am not announcing necessarily that next weekend will be a work period, but I am suggesting to all colleagues that they not make any firm commitments next weekend.

We have to finish the homeland security bill next week. We have to deal with perhaps a continuing resolution, short-term, because of the pending end of this fiscal year. We have a number of other matters that have to be taken up prior to the completion of our work at the end of this session.

As I look at that schedule, I conclude that there is virtually no way we will be able to do this, and do it successfully, without longer hours and more days. The only days available to us, of course, are the Mondays and Fridays that have oftentimes been travel days for our Members but also Saturdays and Sundays.

It is my expectation that we will be using weekend days between now and the end of session, that we will require Senators to be here at least on Saturday and possibly on Sunday in an effort to complete our work. That may occur as early as next weekend.

This is not meant to be a threat or in any way a signal that we are not prepared to take whatever action necessary to preclude that, but I also want Senators to know that that is a very likely possibility.

I come to the floor with a recognition that we do need to make Senators aware of the importance of the schedule and the significant amount of work that needs to be done before we leave.

I appreciate everyone's cooperation and will appreciate the opportunity to speak more specifically to the schedule early next week.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

● Mr. WELLSTONE. Madam President, I regret that I was necessarily absent for the vote on the confirmation of Reena Raggi to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. I would like to include in the RECORD that I would have voted "yes" on this nomination.●

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AKAKA). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. We are now in morning business; is that true?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

TRIBUTE TO DR. KELLY S. SEGARS

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I would like to recognize the professional achievements and public service of a truly extraordinary man, Dr. Kelly S. Segars, and to congratulate him on his selection as the 2002 Mississippi Family Physician of the Year.

The son of the late "Doc" and Ora Segars of Red Bay, Alabama, Dr. Segars displayed a penchant for helping and healing the sick from a very early age. He graduated with honors from high school, pharmacy school, and medical school despite an interruption while serving one tour in the Army during the Korean War. His military decorations include the American Defense Medal, the United Nations Medal, and the Army Commendation Medal.

Upon graduation from medical school in 1959, Dr. Segars entered the practice of Family Medicine in Iuka, Mississippi, not far from his birthplace, where he continues to practice today. Dr. Segars delivered some 500 babies before obtaining his board certification in geriatrics. He has been seeing some of the same patients for over 40 years and considers his many patients simply his "friends who have a medical problem occasionally." Dr. Segars' son joined his practice about 15 years ago, and the clinic, which is vital to the health of so many in the rural community of Iuka, has grown to include 31 employees.

Despite his resounding success as Iuka's resident physician—as if that accomplishment was not already enough for one man—Dr Segars' has consistently worked for the betterment of his community in many other ways. He established the First American National Bank just four years after opening his medical practice. It was the first bank established in the Great State of Mississippi since the bank holiday in 1929 when all of the banks were closed. He also chaired his town's municipal library committee where he initiated the project, obtained the funds, and oversaw construction of the library. His most recent civic project is the re-designation of highway US 72 to Interstate Highway 72, acknowledging the advantage of an Interstate Highway to draw bigger, more lucrative industries to Tishomingo County. It takes a special individual like Dr. Segars, with a clear vision of the future, to recognize the need for a public institution or additional infrastructure, and then to take it upon himself to see to it that the need is fulfilled.

As a charter member of the Board of Directors of the Tishomingo County Development Foundation and Industrial Park, he was instrumental in the acquisition of the Lockheed-Aerojet office and the recent establishment of the AlliantTech Systems facility. He was named as 1992 Citizen of the Year and the Aerospace Business Center was most appropriately named in his honor.

Dr. Segars has served as chair of the University of Mississippi Guardian Society, President of the Medical Alumni Association, and as a member of the Dean's Advisory Committee, University of Mississippi School of Medicine. He also is a member of the Iuka Methodist Church, where he is the Health and Welfare Representative and sits on the Administrative Board.

Dr. Segars' latest recognition as Mississippi Family Physician of the Year, by the Mississippi Academy of Family Physicians, could not have been awarded to a man more deserving of this very special recognition. Chosen from among hundreds of family physicians throughout Mississippi, Dr. Segars was nominated by a fellow physician and selected for the position by a panel of his peers. The panel clearly recognized—as have many others—that Dr. Segars' unique brand of personalized care and true concern for his patients has distinguished him as the best physician that Mississippi, and our country, has to offer.

In addition to his many professional and civic accomplishments, Dr. Segars also is an extremely successful family man. He and his wife Martha are the proud parents of three children: K. Scott Segars, Jr. M.D., and wife Diane; Mark Segars, Tishomingo County Prosecuting Attorney; and Leigh Segars, an attorney in Florida. Dr. Segars and his wife also have three grandsons: Tyler, Jake, and Thompson.

I ask my colleagues to join me today as I congratulate Dr. Kelly S. Segars as the Mississippi Family Practice Physician of the Year and wish him and his family all the best in his future as he continues as a leader in our community. On behalf of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, I thank Dr. Segars for the many things he has done for the town of Iuka, Tishomingo County, the State of Mississippi, and our great Nation.

MORE GUNS EQUALS MORE SUICIDES

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, a study by the Harvard School of Public Health brings to light disturbing information about the presence of firearms in a home. The study conducted by Drs. Matthew Miller, Deborah Azrael, and David Hemenway entitled "Household Firearm Ownership and Suicide Rates in the United States" concluded that in states where gun ownership levels are higher, a disproportionately large number of people commit suicide.

According to the study, of the more than 30,000 suicides in 1998, 57 percent involved the use of a firearm. In states with more guns, people were more likely to commit suicide. The study found that in States with a higher incidence of gun ownership people were 1.6 times more likely to commit suicide than people in states with a lower incidence of gun ownership. Further, the Harvard study shows that people 15–24 years old from states with a high incidence of gun ownership are more than four times more likely to commit suicide than people the same age in states with a low incidence of gun ownership. According to statistics cited by the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, in 1998, more than 1200 children aged 10–19 committed suicide with firearms. Nearly two-thirds of all completed teenage suicides involve a firearm.

One step that can be taken to reduce suicides among children is to prevent easy access to guns for children. I cosponsored Senator DURBIN's Child Access Prevention Act because it would do just that. Under this bill, adults who fail to lock up loaded firearms or an unloaded firearm with ammunition could be held liable if a weapon is taken by a child and used to kill or injure him or herself or another person. The bill would also increase the penalties for selling a gun to a juvenile and create a gun safety education program that includes parent-teacher organizations, local law enforcement and community organizations. This bill is similar to legislation President Bush signed into law as Governor of Texas. I support this bill and I believe it is a meaningful step in the right direction. It's clear that reducing child access to guns can save lives.

NATIONAL POW/MIA RECOGNITION DAY

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, today is National POW/MIA Recognition Day.

I rise on this special day to remember and honor those brave Americans who during past armed engagements in defense of this nation or our alliances were prisoners of war and those who are still listed missing in action. As a nation, we set aside this day to further recognize the sacrifices of the restless families of these fine patriots, assuring them that we have not forgotten.

In the past year, our dedicated Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen and Marines have again taken up the mantle of freedom; this time to prosecute an elusive and dangerous enemy. They have ousted an oppressive regime in Afghanistan and continue to hunt those implicated in the war on terrorism. Like generations before them, these Americans have sworn an oath to support and defend the Constitution. As a former Navy officer, I feel strongly that the United States government has a similarly strong obligation to these men and women who serve in the Armed Forces. Specifically, we must work to ensure the return of POWs and MIAs at the end of hostilities. We must not rest until all American POW/MIAs are returned and accounted for, and the many questions that have overwhelmed their families are answered.

The vigorous pursuit of this commitment must continue through on-site investigations being undertaken in Indochina and through a fuller examination of records in Russia, Iraq and Southeast Asia. For in our history, we recall somberly today that while thousands died, many others endured years in starved, tortured, isolated misery before regaining their freedom. Their perseverance, integrity and heroism are shining examples of the core values on which this nation was founded and became great.

A year ago, Americans were sifting through smoldering rubble at the Pentagon and at the site of the twin towers looking for their comrades in arms. Those actions have ceased, but around the world, others continue to sift through long-silent war zones to find and identify remains of the fallen and the missing.

The Department of Defense Prisoner of War/Missing Personnel Office has had considerable successes in the past year, but we still have much to accomplish before our responsibility to all the POWs and MIAs is fulfilled. Just this year, we have identified the remains of 46 Americans who served in the Vietnam War. Unfortunately, there are still 1,907 unaccounted Americans who served in Vietnam. Also this year, 32 Americans have been repatriated who served in the Korean War, while over 8,100 remain unaccounted for. And, through hard work and determination in the past year, the DPMO has recovered the remains of eight Americans who served in the Second World War. 78,750 Americans who served in World War II are as yet accounted.

It is important to remember that this is a cooperative effort and requires commitments from all branches of our government as well as the countries where the servicemen remain missing. Negotiations in the past six years with North Korea have yielded many successes. One search operation continues even today in North Korea and a third and final operation for the year will begin on September 28, concluding October 29.

According to the Department of Defense, America has had 23 operations since 1996 to locate MIA's in North Korea. These missions are all possible because of cooperation and negotiation with North Korea. Let this cooperation be an example to all of what can be accomplished when we work together.

Today, I want to pay special tribute to the dedication and service of the soldiers from my home State of Indiana who are or were POW/MIAs from the Vietnam War and the Korean War.

These great Americans and their families have the gratitude of this free Nation. I urge the Senate, the administration, the Departments of Defense and State, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the National Security Agency to redouble their efforts to bring our soldiers home as quickly as possible. Let us all take heart from the POW/MIA flag, displayed in the Capitol rotunda, which proclaims: "You Are Not Forgotten."

I ask unanimous consent that the names of Indiana's missing and unaccounted from the Korea and Vietnam Wars be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IRAQ

Mr. VOINOVICH. Mr. President, I submit for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following statement on Iraq, which I released following the President's remarks to the United Nations one week ago today. I ask unanimous consent that my statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. VOINOVICH. President Bush's speech today before the United Nations outlined well Saddam Hussein's sustained history of defiance of UN resolutions and the will of the international community. He left no doubt in any reasonable person's mind that Iraq is a threat to the stability of the Middle East, is a danger to his own people, and is fundamentally hostile to the basic human rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness upon which our nation is founded. Saddam Hussein is a threat to peace and his defiance of the world community and his continued pursuit of weapons of mass destruction show that he has no intention of changing his ways.

The President's simple recitation of Iraq's defiance and broken promises was convincing and persuasive. No interpretation was required. The President said it best: "By breaking every pledge by his deceptions and his cruelties, Saddam Hussein has made the case against himself."

The President's challenge, therefore, isn't making the case against Iraq, but building the support for action to force Iraqi compliance with UN resolutions calling for it to cease its support of terrorist groups, cease the production of weapons of mass destruction and allow international weapons inspections. Generating this support among the American people, Congress and our international partners is critical if any effort to deal with the Iraqi threat is to be successful.

As governor of Ohio and commander-in-chief of the Ohio National Guard during the Persian Gulf War, I saw firsthand how the unequivocal support that existed for our campaign to evict Saddam Hussein from Kuwait made it so much easier for our soldiers to leave home for an overseas mission. Ohioans supported our military mission and they supported our troops. There was no doubt about Saddam Hussein's guilt or his need to be stopped. This type of support is important if we are to ultimately succeed in stopping the Iraqi threat.

With his speech today, President Bush has started to build this base of support. I applaud his decision to go before the world community at the United Nations and to challenge the body to stand behind its resolutions, live up to its charter and be a force for peace and the preservation of human rights. The President's meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair last weekend and his recent series of conversations with world leaders are the right beginning. It must be built upon and strengthened. Our allies must be consulted, probed for advice, and engaged in the process, not just lectured, if we are to succeed. The President also must reach out to our emerging allies in the Middle East who, since 9–11, have begun to cooperate in the war on terrorism.

There is still much work to do as we consider options for confronting the looming threat presented by Iraq's ongoing programs to develop weapons of mass destruction. It is clear that we cannot sit idly by and allow Saddam Hussein to move forward in his work to acquire these deadly capabilities. As we examine possible courses of action I'm confident the President is going to take every necessary step to continue to make his case to Congress and to the American people, and to consult with our allies as well as the countries in the region with whom we have emerging, important relationships. We owe it to those at home and abroad that we seek to protect from Saddam Hussein and his weapons to be diligent in the building of consensus so that our efforts to handle the Iraqi threat can be successful and conclusive.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TRIBUTE TO NORMA DICKSON

• Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I would like to take the opportunity to congratulate Norma Eudora Cronk Dickson. On October 16th, 2002 she will celebrate her 100th birthday. Norma is a resident of Chinook, MT.

Norma Dickson was born October 16, 1902. She was the eldest of four children born to John Colburn Cronk and Anna Rogers Cronk. John and Anna Cronk moved to Montana in 1898, and settled in the Milk River Valley in Coburg, MT. Her parents were ranchers and prominent members of the community. Her father John was elected State representative in Montana in 1923. Her parents raised cattle and prize winning Percheron horses. The livestock pavilion at the Blaine County Fairgrounds was dedicated to her father's memory.

Norma attended college and taught for a few years prior to her marriage in 1928 to Dr. Joseph Robert Dickson, another Montana native who practiced dentistry in Chinook, MT.

Norma and Dr. Dickson had four children, Joseph Robert Dickson Jr., Marilyn Dickson Gregg, James Cronk Dickson, and George William Hunt Dickson. They also have thirteen grandchildren and ten great-grandchildren.

In addition to Norma's dedication to her family, she has been very active in her community of Chinook, MT. Her involvements include the Eastern Star, Chinook Presbyterian Church, and High School Girl's State. She has also worked at the Chinook Senior Center as a volunteer from its inception until she was 97 years old. Finally, she was named Senior of the Year in Chinook. She is a treasure to her community, her State, and of course, to her family.•

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

• Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY in March of last year. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a terrible crime that occurred February 11, 2001 in Rifle, CO. Kyle Skyock, 16, was found unconscious on the side of a road after being beaten by four teenage boys who believed he was gay. Skyock's injuries included a fractured skull, burns, three broken ribs, and a bruise described by doctors as being in the shape of a two-by-four. During the beating, the assailants made derogatory comments about the victim's perceived sexual orientation.

I believe that government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.•

OREGON'S TECHNOLOGY LEADERS

• Mr. WYDEN. Mr. President, a little more than a year ago, the terrible events of September 11 forced the awakening and mobilization of a critical resource in this country. In response to that tremendous tragedy, America's technology innovators, skilled workers in all walks of life, have stepped forward to help America address the numerous threats our enemies pose.

One of these threats is cybersecurity. As computer networks have become increasingly central to this Nation's infrastructure and businesses, that the importance of securing our information and information technologies has grown. Today I wish to draw the Senate's attention to emerging technologies for dealing with these new threats. I also want to discuss how this country can maximize a uniquely American resource: that is, the skilled innovation of our tech sector.

Technology workers and managers from my home State of Oregon have inspired me with their technical skills and their passion to put their talents to work serving America. The Portland area is home to one of the Nation's largest concentration of cybersecurity vendors in the country. Portland now boasts a remarkable cluster of small and large companies actively working to make America's portion of cyberspace a safer place.

Just a few examples: Tripwire is the world leader in data integrity assurance, providing software that establishes the foundation for IT security and reliability. Tripwire is used to protect some of the world's most sensitive data, and that includes some of the most important systems right here in Washington.

Digimarc provides digitally watermarked drivers licenses for 37 States, and supplies official identification documents for governments around the world. Its technology enables authentication with a greater level of assurance than has historically been possible.

Swan Island Networks is building software platforms that enable secure communications of sensitive information to trusted users across organizational boundaries. It is helping Federal and local agencies and first responders to communicate effectively to audiences inside and outside the firewall.

Intel Corporation, which has its largest base of employment in Oregon, is leading the National Emergency Messaging Systems initiative from the Portland area. Intel is helping local, State and Federal officials respond to emergencies.

WireX has won international recognition for its Immunix Network Security Solutions. The company was founded by a grant from DARPA in 1998.

Galois Connections designs and develops high confidence software for critical and demanding applications. Its clientele includes the National Security Agency.

Kryptiq builds secure email systems that are built to preserve privacy, as well as the integrity of documents.

Oregon is home to many, many more, including Flatrock, Infotects, Network Associates, Rulespace, TechTracker and True Disk. Some of these companies have persevered and become successful selling products and services that government is using to defend its infrastructure. Many others have developed products, launched companies, and knocked on doors in Washington, trying to find an entry point. Their efforts must be sustained and encouraged.

There are numerous ways to provide that encouragement, and not all of them originate in Washington. It is vital to look at what is working on the local level and nurture it there. It is time to lower the speedbumps. Straighten the curves. Shorten the straightaways. Bring our technological talent quickly to the front lines of this new kind of war.

In Oregon, a coalition of these cybersecurity companies has come together in the wake of 9/11. The Oregon Regional Alliance for Information and Network Security, or Oregon RAINS, is banding together to offer products and services America needs now. These companies are working together to find new ways of navigating the Federal bureaucracy to get their products on the ground.

In my view, the Federal Government should do all it can to be responsive to organizations like Oregon RAINS. Currently, our sluggish bureaucracy often discriminates against small, young and distant vendors. America's enemies won't be defeated solely by the ideas of huge corporations or entrenched government contractors. This country needs the help of smaller, nimble players who are long on passion and talent, but short on expertise about dealing with their Federal Government.

It is essential to eliminate the roadblocks American innovators face. A 20-person company in Beaverton, OR shouldn't have to devote precious resources to hiring lobbyists, making multiple trips to see different people in different agencies, and pursuing expensive and, frankly, frequently obsolete certifications.

Earlier this year I was proud to author the Science and Technology Emergency Mobilization Act, along with my colleague Senator ALLEN, and to see it passed by this Senate. That legislation mandated the creation of a clearinghouse, or single entry point, for technology innovators offering new products for the war on terrorism. I am gratified to see that concept echoed in the Homeland Security legislation sponsored by Senator LIEBERMAN.

My legislation, as well as Senator LIEBERMAN's homeland security bill, also directs the executive branch to establish a national test bed to evaluate new technologies.

In my view, this national test bed could eventually serve as a model for regional test beds. If that little company in Beaverton, OR, could run pilot programs in its backyard, the company could more easily answer questions, deal with challenges and monitor results.

Regional efforts to test new technologies would also increase our likelihood of finding unexpected solutions in unexpected places. Some technology or technique that we couldn't have foreseen might pop up and help us win this war. The beauty of American innovation is that it could just as easily come from a suburban basement, a sparsely furnished loft, or a coalition of small companies as it could from the business-as-usual landscape.

There are other ways the Federal Government can be a better partner to small technology innovators like those in my home State. Accelerating research and public-private technology partnerships through Federal grants. Deepening our cyber-security bench by funding IT education and channeling bright students into those areas. Raising awareness in the general public so that everyone sees the importance of securing this country's infrastructure.

I can assure you that in my home state alone there are a plethora of skilled software engineers and managers who are eager to see their technologies deployed to serve America. The Federal Government needs to partner with them and help them help their neighbors. American lives are at stake.●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SARBANES (for himself and Ms. MIKULSKI):

S. 2984. A bill to authorize a project for environmental restoration at Smith Island, Maryland; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this measure would authorize the Smith Island, Maryland ecosystem restoration project. Joining me in sponsoring this measure is my colleague Senator MIKULSKI.

Smith Island, is one of the last remaining inhabited islands in the Chesapeake Bay and an area of unique cultural, historical and environmental significance. Because of its location and elevation, it is highly susceptible to the damaging forces of nature. In the past 150 years, more than 3,000 acres of the island have eroded into the Chesapeake Bay. As a consequence, the communities of Ewell, Tylerton and Rhodes Point are seriously threatened, the Federal navigation channels shoal within months after dredging, and habitat and other natural resources are being lost at an alarming rate. Since 1993 alone, the Smith Island vicinity has lost over 2400 acres of Submerged Aquatic Vegetation, SAV ecologically valuable wetlands have also been lost. This habitat is critical to the health of the Bay and the area's fishing and crabbing industry.

Over the years, Senator MIKULSKI and I have worked very closely with the citizens of Smith Island, the Somerset County Commissioners, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and other State and Federal resource agencies to address the serious erosion problem and other needs on the island. Among other projects, we secured funding to help protect the eroding shoreline of Tylerton, to dredge the channels and repair of the stone jetties leading into Ewell, which has also helped with the erosion problem in that community, to construct a new sewage treatment facility, and to expedite completion of the Corps of Engineers' feasibility study for Smith Island.

That latter study was completed in May of 2001 and the Chief of Engineers report on this project was transmitted to the Congress in October, 2001. The reports recommend construction of offshore segmented breakwaters and back-filling to create additional wetlands along the coastline of Martin National Wildlife Refuge to stop or reverse the tremendous loss of SAV around parts of Smith Island. The recommended plan is expected to protect approximately 720 acres and restore about 1,400 acres of wetland and SUV habitat. The legislation, which we are introducing today, would authorize construction of this project at a total cost of approximately $7.5 million. It is our hope that this measure will be included as part of a broader package of water resource projects being developed by the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Whereas it is the family, striving for a future of opportunity and hope, that reflects our Nation's belief in community, stability, and love;

Whereas the family remains an institution of promise, reliance, and encouragement;

Whereas we look to the family as an unwavering symbol of constancy that will help us discover a future of prosperity, promise, and potential;

Whereas within our Nation's libraries and archives lie the treasured records that detail the history of our Nation, our States, our communities, and our citizens;

Whereas individuals from across our Nation and across the world have embarked on a genealogical journey by discovering who their ancestors were and how various forces shaped their past;

Whereas an ever-growing number in our Nation and in other nations are collecting, preserving, and sharing genealogies, personal documents, and memorabilia that detail the life and times of families around the world;

Whereas 54,000,000 individuals belong to a family where someone in the family has used the Internet to research their family history;

Whereas individuals from across our Nation and across the world continue to research their family heritage and its impact upon the history of our Nation and the world;

Whereas approximately 60 percent of Americans have expressed an interest in tracing their family history;

Whereas the study of family history gives individuals a sense of their heritage and a sense of responsibility in carrying out a legacy that their ancestors began;

Whereas as individuals learn about their ancestors who worked so hard and sacrificed so much, their commitment to honor their ancestors' memory by doing good is increased;

Whereas interest in our personal family history transcends all cultural and religious affiliations;

Whereas to encourage family history research, education, and the sharing of knowledge is to renew the commitment to the concept of home and family; and

Whereas the involvement of National, State, and local officials in promoting genealogy and in facilitating access to family history records in archives and libraries are important factors in the successful perception of nationwide camaraderie, support, and participation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate—

(1) designates the month of October 2002, as "Family History Month"; and

(2) requests that the President issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 144—EXPRESSING THE SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT THE PRESIDENT SHOULD POSTHUMOUSLY AWARD THE PRESIDENTIAL MEDAL OF FREEDOM TO HARRY W. COLMERY

Mr. ROBERTS (for himself and Mr. BROWNBACK) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the life of Harry W. Colmery of Topeka, Kansas, was marked by service to his country and its citizens;

Whereas Harry Colmery earned a degree in law in 1916 from the University of Pittsburgh and, through his practice of law, contributed to the Nation, notably by successfully arguing two significant cases before the United States Supreme Court, one criminal, the other an environmental legal dispute;

Whereas during World War I, Harry Colmery joined the Army Air Service, serving as a first lieutenant at a time when military aviation was in its infancy;

Whereas after World War I, Harry Colmery actively contributed to the growth of the newly formed American Legion and went on to hold several offices in the Legion and was elected National Commander in 1936;

Whereas in 1943, the United States faced the return from World War II of what was to become an active duty force of 15,000,000 soldiers, sailors, airmen, and Marines;

Whereas Harry Colmery, recognizing the potential effect of the return of such a large number of veterans to civilian life, set out to craft legislation seeking to ensure that these Americans who had fought for the democratic ideals of the Nation and to preserve freedom would be able to fully participate in all of the opportunities the Nation provided;

Whereas in December 1943, Harry Colmery crafted the initial draft of the legislation that became the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, also known as the GI Bill of Rights;

Whereas the GI Bill of Rights is credited by veterans' service organizations, economists, and historians as the engine that transformed postwar America into a more egalitarian, prosperous, and enlightened Nation poised to lead the world in the 21st century;

Whereas since its enactment, the GI Bill of Rights has provided education or training for approximately 7,800,000 men and women, including 2,200,000 in college, 3,400,000 in other schools, 1,400,000 in vocational education, and 690,000 in farm training;

Whereas as a result of the benefits available to veterans through the initial GI Bill, the Nation gained over 800,000 professionals as the GI Bill transformed these veterans into 450,000 engineers, 238,000 teachers, 91,000 scientists, 67,000 doctors, and 22,000 dentists;

Whereas 2,100,000 World War II veterans purchased homes through the GI Bill;

Whereas President Truman established the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1945 to recognize notable service during war and in 1963 President Kennedy reinstated the medal to honor the achievement of civilians during peacetime;

Whereas pursuant to Executive Order 11085, the Medal of Freedom may be awarded to any person who has made an especially meritorious contribution to "(1) the security or national interests of the United States, or (2) world peace, or (3) cultural or other significant public or private endeavors"; and

Whereas Harry Colmery, noted for his service in the military, in the legal sector, and on behalf of the Nation's veterans, clearly meets the criteria established for the Presidential Medal of Freedom: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that the President should posthumously award the Presidential Medal of Freedom to Harry W. Colmery of Topeka, Kansas.

Whereas the family remains an institution of promise, reliance, and encouragement;

Whereas we look to the family as an unwavering symbol of constancy that will help us discover a future of prosperity, promise, and potential;

Whereas within our Nation's libraries and archives lie the treasured records that detail the history of our Nation, our States, our communities, and our citizens;

Whereas individuals from across our Nation and across the world have embarked on a genealogical journey by discovering who their ancestors were and how various forces shaped their past;

Whereas an ever-growing number in our Nation and in other nations are collecting, preserving, and sharing genealogies, personal documents, and memorabilia that detail the life and times of families around the world;

Whereas 54,000,000 individuals belong to a family where someone in the family has used the Internet to research their family history;

Whereas individuals from across our Nation and across the world continue to research their family heritage and its impact upon the history of our Nation and the world;

Whereas approximately 60 percent of Americans have expressed an interest in tracing their family history;

Whereas the study of family history gives individuals a sense of their heritage and a sense of responsibility in carrying out a legacy that their ancestors began;

Whereas as individuals learn about their ancestors who worked so hard and sacrificed so much, their commitment to honor their ancestors' memory by doing good is increased;

Whereas interest in our personal family history transcends all cultural and religious affiliations;

Whereas to encourage family history research, education, and the sharing of knowledge is to renew the commitment to the concept of home and family; and

Whereas the involvement of National, State, and local officials in promoting genealogy and in facilitating access to family history records in archives and libraries are important factors in the successful perception of nationwide camaraderie, support, and participation: Now, therefore, be it

HOW SADDAM HAPPENED

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, yesterday, at a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I asked a question of the Secretary of Defense. I referred to a Newsweek article that will appear in the September 23, 2002, edition. That article reads as follows. It is not overly lengthy. I shall read it. Beginning on page 35 of Newsweek, here is what the article says:

> America helped make a monster. What to do with him—and what happens after he is gone—has haunted us for a quarter century.

> The last time Donald Rumsfeld saw Saddam Hussein, he gave him a cordial handshake. The date was almost 20 years ago, Dec. 20, 1983; an official Iraqi television crew recorded the historic moment.
>
> The once and future Defense secretary, at the time a private citizen, had been sent by President Ronald Reagan to Baghdad as a special envoy. Saddam Hussein, armed with a pistol on his hip, seemed "vigorous and confident," according to a now declassified State Department cable obtained by Newsweek. Rumsfeld "conveyed the President's greetings and expressed his pleasure at being in Baghdad," wrote the notetaker. Then the two men got down to business, talking about the need to improve relations between their two countries.
>
> Like most foreign-policy insiders, Rumsfeld was aware that Saddam was a murderous thug who supported terrorists and was trying to build a nuclear weapon. (The Israelis had already bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor at Osirak.) But at the time, America's big worry was Iran, not Iraq. The Reagan administration feared that the Iranian revolutionaries who had overthrown the shah (and taken hostage American diplomats for 444 days in 1979–81) would overrun the Middle East and its vital oilfields. On the—theory that the enemy of my enemy is my friend, the Reaganites were seeking to support Iraq in a long and bloody war against Iran. The meeting between Rumsfeld and Saddam was consequential: for the next five years, until Iran finally capitulated, the United States backed Saddam's armies with military intelligence, economic aid and covert supplies of munitions.
>
> Rumsfeld is not the first American diplomat to wish for the demise of a former ally. After all, before the cold war, the Soviet Union was America's partner against Hitler in World War II. In the real world, as the saying goes, nations have no permanent friends, just permanent interests. Nonetheless, Rumsfeld's long-ago interlude with Saddam is a reminder that today's friend can be tomorrow's mortal threat. As President George W. Bush and his war cabinet ponder Saddam's successor's regime, they would do well to contemplate how and why the last three presidents allowed the Butcher of Baghdad to stay in power so long.
>
> The history of America's relations with Saddam is one of the sorrier tales in American foreign policy. Time and again, America turned a blind eye to Saddam's predations, saw him as the lesser evil or flinched at the chance to unseat him. No single policymaker or administration deserves blame for creating, or at least tolerating, a monster; many of their decisions seemed reasonable at the time. Even so, there are moments in this clumsy dance with the Devil that make one cringe. It is hard to believe that, during most of the 1980s, America knowingly permitted the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission to import bacterial cultures that might be used to build biological weapons.

Let me read that again:

> It is hard to believe that, during most of the 1980s, America knowingly permitted the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission to import bacterial cultures that might be used to build biological weapons. But it happened.
>
> America's past stumbles, while embarrassing, are not an argument for inaction in the future. Saddam probably is the "grave and gathering danger" described by President Bush in his speech to the United Nations last week. It may also be true that "whoever replaces Saddam is not going to be worse," as a senior administration official put it to Newsweek. But the story of how America helped create a Frankenstein monster it now wishes to strangle is sobering. It illustrates the power of wishful thinking, as well as the iron law of unintended consequences.
>
> America did not put Saddam in power. He emerged after two decades of turmoil in the '60s and '70s, as various strongmen tried to gain control of a nation that had been concocted by British imperialists in the 1920s out of three distinct and rival factions, the Sunnis, Shiites and the Kurds. But during the cold war, America competed with the Soviets for Saddam's attention and welcomed his war with the religious fanatics of Iran. Having cozied up to Saddam, Washington found it hard to break away—even after going to war with him in 1991. Through years of both tacit and overt support, the West helped create the Saddam of today, giving him time to build deadly arsenals and dominate his people. Successive administrations always worried that if Saddam fell, chaos would follow, rippling through the region and possibly igniting another Middle East war. At times it seemed that Washington was transfixed by Saddam.
>
> The Bush administration wants to finally break the spell. If the administration's true believers are right, Baghdad, after Saddam falls will look something like Paris after the Germans fled in August 1944. American troops will be cheered as liberators, and democracy will spread forth and push Middle Eastern despotism back into the shadows. Yet if the gloomy predictions of the administration's many critics come true, the Arab street, inflamed by Yankee imperialism, will rise up and replace the shaky but friendly autocrats in the region with Islamic fanatics.
>
> While the Middle East is unlikely to become a democratic nirvana, the worst-case scenarios, always a staple of the press, are probably also wrong or exaggerated. Assuming that a cornered and doomed Saddam does not kill thousands of Americans in some kind of horrific Gotterdammerung—a scary possibility, one that deeply worries administration officials—the greatest risk of his fall is that one strongman may simply be replaced by another. Saddam's successor may not be a paranoid sadist. But there is no assurance that he will be America's friend or forswear the development of weapons of mass destruction.
>
> American officials have known that Saddam was a psychopath—

Get that.

> American officials have known that Saddam was a psychopath ever since he became the country's de facto ruler in the early 1970s. One of Saddam's early acts after he took the title of president in 1979 was to videotape a session of his party's congress, during which he personally ordered several members executed on the spot.

Let me repeat that:

> American officials have known that Saddam was a psychopath ever since he became the country's de facto ruler in the early 1970s. One of Saddam's early acts after he took the title of president in 1979 was to videotape—

Videotape—

>
> The message, carefully conveyed to the Arab press, was not that these men were executed for plotting against Saddam, but rather for thinking about plotting against him. From the beginning, U.S. officials worried about Saddam's taste for nasty weaponry; indeed, at their meeting in 1983, Rumsfeld warned that Saddam's use of chemical weapons might "inhibit" American assistance. But top officials in the Reagan administration saw Saddam as a useful surrogate. By going to war with Iran, he could bleed the radical mullahs who had seized control of Iran from the pro-American shah. Some Reagan officials even saw Saddam as another Anwar Sadat, capable of making Iraq into a modern secular state, just as Sadat had tried to lift up Egypt before his assassination in 1981.
>
> But Saddam had to be rescued first. The war against Iran was going badly by 1982. Iran's "human wave attacks" threatened to overrun Saddam's armies. Washington decided to give Iraq a helping hand.
>
> After Rumsfeld's visit to Baghdad in 1983, U.S. intelligence began supplying the Iraqi dictator with satellite photos showing Iranian deployments. Offfcial documents suggest that America may also have secretly arranged for tanks and other military hardware to be shipped to Iraq in a swap deal—American tanks to Egypt, Egyptian tanks to Iraq. Over the protest of some Pentagon skeptics, the Reagan administration began allowing the Iraqis to buy a wide variety of "dual use" equipment and materials from American suppliers. According to confidential Commerce Department export-control documents obtained by NEWSWEEK, the shopping list included a computerized database for Saddam's Interior Ministry (presumably to help keep track of political opponents); helicopters to transport Iraqi officials; television cameras for "video surveillance applications"; chemical-analysis equipment for the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission (IAEC), and, most unsettling, numerous shipments of "bacteria/fungi/protozoa" to the IAEC. According to former officials, the bacterial cultures could be used to make biological weapons, including anthrax. The State Department also approved the shipment of 1.5 million atropine injectors, for use against the effects of chemical weapons, but the Pentagon blocked the sale. The helicopters, some American officials later surmised, were used to spray poison gas on the Kurds.
>
> The United States almost certainly knew from its own satellite imagery that Saddam was using chemical weapons against Iranian troops. When Saddam bombed Kurdish rebels and civilians with a lethal cocktail of mustard gas, sarin, tabun and VX in 1988, the Reagan administration first blamed Iran, before acknowledging, under pressure from congressional Democrats, that the culprits were Saddam's own forces. There was only token official protest at the time. Saddam's men were unfazed. An Iraqi audiotape, later captured by the Kurds, records Saddam's cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid (known as Ali Chemical) talking to his fellow officers about gassing the Kurds. "Who is going to say anything?" he asks. "The international community? F——k them!"
>
> The United States was much more concerned with protecting Iraqi oil from attacks by Iran as it was shipped through the Persian Gulf. In 1987, an Iraqi Exocet missile hit an American destroyer, the USS Stark, in the Persian Gulf, killing 37 crewmen. Incredibly, the United States excused Iraq for making an unintentional mistake and instead used the incident to accuse Iran of escalating the war in the gulf. The American tilt to Iraq became more pronounced. U.S. commandos began blowing up Iranian oil platforms and attacking Iranian patrol boats. In 1988, an American warship in the gulf accidentally shot down an Iranian Airbus, killing 290 civilians. Within a few weeks, Iran, exhausted and fearing American intervention, gave up its war with Iraq.
>
> Saddam was feeling cocky. With the support of the West, he had defeated the Islamic revolutionaries in Iran. America favored him as a regional pillar; European and American corporations were vying for contracts with Iraq. He was visited by congressional delegations led by Sens. Bob Dole of Kansas and Alan Simpson of Wyoming, who were eager to promote American farm and business interests. But Saddam's megalomania was on the rise, and he overplayed his hand. In 1990, a U.S. Customs sting operation snared several Iraqi agents who were trying to buy electronic equipment used to make triggers for nuclear bombs. Not long after, Saddam gained the world's attention by threatening "to burn Israel to the ground." At the Pentagon, analysts began to warn that Saddam was a growing menace, especially after he tried to buy some American-made high-tech furnaces useful for making nuclear-bomb parts. Yet other officials in Congress and in the Bush administration continued to see him as a useful, if distasteful, regional strongman. The State Department was equivocating with Saddam right up to the moment he invaded Kuwait in August 1990.

Mr. President, I referred to this Newsweek article yesterday at a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Specifically; during the hearing, I asked Secretary Rumsfeld:

> Mr. Secretary, to your knowledge, did the United States help Iraq to acquire the building blocks of biological weapons during the Iran-Iraq war? Are we in fact now facing the possibility of reaping what we have sewn?

The Secretary quickly and flatly denied any knowledge but said he would review Pentagon records.

I suggest that the administration speed up that review. My concerns and the concerns of others have grown.

A letter from the Centers For Disease Control and Prevention, which I shall submit for the RECORD, shows very clearly that the United States is, in fact, preparing to reap what it has sewn. A letter written in 1995 by former CDC Director David Satcher to former Senator Donald W. Riegle, Jr., points out that the U.S. Government provided nearly two dozen viral and bacterial samples to Iraqi scientists in 1985—samples that included the plague, botulism, and anthrax, among other deadly diseases.

According to the letter from Dr. Satcher to former Senator Donald Riegle, many of the materials were hand carried by an Iraqi scientist to Iraq after he had spent 3 months training in the CDC laboratory.

The Armed Services Committee is requesting information from the Departments of Commerce, State, and Defense on the history of the United States, providing the building blocks for weapons of mass destruction to Iraq. I recommend that the Department of Health and Human Services also be included in that request.

The American people do not need obfuscation and denial. The American people need the truth. The American people need to know whether the United States is in large part responsible for the very Iraqi weapons of mass destruction which the administration now seeks to destroy.

We may very well have created the monster that we seek to eliminate. The Senate deserves to know the whole story. The American people deserve answers to the whole story.

Also yesterday, in the same 6 minutes that I was given in which to ask questions—which was extended by virtue of the kindness of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, Mr. MAX CLELAND, and other members of the committee, so it was perhaps 9 or 10 minutes—there was another interesting question that I asked. Let me read a portion of that transcript from the Armed Services Committee:

> Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for holding these hearings. Mr. Secretary, to your knowledge, did the United States help Iraq to acquire the building blocks of biological weapons during the Iran-Iraq War? Are we, in fact, now facing the possibility of reaping what we have sown?
>
> Rumsfeld: Certainly not to my knowledge. I have no knowledge of United States companies or government being involved in assisting Iraq develop chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

There is another excerpt from that question and answer period in which Secretary Rumsfeld and I engaged:

> Byrd: Now, the Washington Post reported this morning [yesterday] that the United States is stepping away from efforts to strengthen the Biological Weapons Convention. Are we not sending exactly the wrong signal to the world, at exactly the wrong time?
>
> Doesn't this damage our credibility in the international community at the very time that we are seeking their support to neutralize the threat of Iraq's biological weapons program? If we supplied, as the Newsweek article said, if we supplied the building blocks for germ and chemical warfare to this madman in the first place, this psychopath, how do we look to the world to be backing away from this effort to control it at this point?

That question speaks for itself. I ask unanimous consent that the following material be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks: The partial transcript from the Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on September 19; the article from the Washington Post of yesterday, titled "U.S.

Drops Bid to Strengthen Germ Warfare Accord''; the Newsweek article, which I have alluded to already; a letter dated January 6, 1994, requesting information from the Centers for Disease Control and a response to the Honorable Donald W. Riegle, Jr., U.S. Senator, dated June 21, 1995, from David Satcher, M.D., Ph.D., Director; a U.S. Senate Hearing Report 103–900, dealing with U.S. exports of biological materials to Iraq to the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs which has oversight responsibility for the Export Administration Act, and keeping in mind that the U.S. Department of Commerce approves licenses by that Department for exports; including also the U.S. Senate hearing report in that matter. Included in the approved sales are such items as Bacillus Anthracis, anthrax, Clostridium Botulinum, Histoplasma Capsulatum, which causes a disease superficially resembling tuberculosis that may cause pneumonia; Brucella Melitensis, a bacteria which can cause chronic fatigue, and so on; Clostridium Perfringens, which causes gas gangrene. I believe that completes the list.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BYRD-RUMSFELD TRANSCRIPT—PARTIAL TRANSCRIPT FROM SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE, SEPTEMBER 19, 2002

LEVIN. Senator Byrd?

BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for holding these hearings.

Mr. Secretary, to your knowledge, did the United States help Iraq to acquire the building blocks of biological weapons during the Iran-Iraq War? Are we, in fact, now facing the possibility of reaping what we have sown?

RUMSFELD. Certainly not to my knowledge. I have no knowledge of United States companies or government being involved in assisting Iraq develop chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

BYRD. Mr. Secretary, let me read to you from the September 23, 2002, Newsweek story. I read this, I read excerpts, because my time is limited.

''Some Reagan officials even saw Saddam as another Anwar Sadat, capable of making Iraq into a modern secular state, just as Sadat had tried to lift up Egypt before his assassination in 1981. But Saddam had to be rescued first. The war against Iran was going badly by 1982.''

BYRD. ''Iran's human-wave attacks threatened to overrun Saddam's armies. Washington decided to give Iraq a helping hand. After Rumsfeld's visit to Baghdad in 1982, U.S. intelligence began supplying the Iraqi dictator with satellite photos showing Iranian deployments.

''Official documents suggest that America may also have secretly arranged for tanks and other military hardware to be shipped to Iraq in a swap deal: American tanks to Egypt, Egyptian tanks to Iraq.

''Over the protest of some Pentagon skeptics, the Reagan administration began allowing the Iraqis to buy a wide variety of, quote, 'dual-use,' close quote, equipment and materials from American suppliers.

''According to confidential Commerce Department export control documents obtained by Newsweek, the shopping list included a computerized database for Saddam's Interior Ministry, presumably to help keep track of political opponents, helicopters to help transport Iraqi officials, television cameras for video surveillance applications, chemical analysis equipment for the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission, IAEC, and, most unsettling, numerous shipments of the bacteria, fungi, protozoa to the IAEC.

''According to former officials the bacterial cultures could be used to make biological weapons, including anthrax. The State Department also approved the shipment of 1.5 million atropine injectors for use against the effects of chemical weapons but the Pentagon blocked the sale.

''The helicopters, some American officials later surmised, were used to spray poison gas on the Kurds. The United States almost certainly knew from its own satellite imagery that Saddam was using chemical weapons against Iranian troops.

''When Saddam bombed Kurdish rebels and civilians with a lethal cocktail of mustard gas, sarin, tabun and VX in 1988, the Reagan administration first blamed Iran before acknowledging, under pressure from congressional Democrats, that the culprit were Saddam's own forces. There was only token official protest at the time. Saddam's men were unfazed.

''An Iraqi audiotape later captured by the Kurds records Saddam's cousin, Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as Ali Chemical, talking to his fellow officers about gassing the Kurds. Quote, 'Who is going to say anything?' close quote, he asks, 'the international community? F-blank them!' exclamation point, close quote.''

Now can this possibly be true? We already knew that Saddam was a dangerous man at the time. I realize that you were not in public office at the time, but you were dispatched to Iraq by President Reagan to talk about the need to improve relations between Iraq and the U.S.

Let me ask you again: To your knowledge did the United States help Iraq to acquire the building blocks of biological weapons during the Iran-Iraq war? Are we, in fact, now facing the possibility of reaping what we have sown?

The Washington Post reported this morning that the United States is stepping away from efforts to strengthen the Biological Weapons Convention. I'll have a question on that later.

Let me ask you again: Did the United States help Iraq to acquire the building blocks of biological weapons during the Iran-Iraq War? Are we, in fact, now facing the possibility of reaping what we have sown?

RUMSFELD. I have not read the article. As you suggest, I was, for a period in late '83 and early '84, asked by President Reagan to serve as Middle East envoy after the Marines—241 Marines were killed in Beirut.

As part of my responsibilities I did visit Baghdad. I did meet with Mr. Tariq Aziz. And I did meet with Saddam Hussein and spent some time visiting with them about the war they were engaged in with Iran.

At the time our concern, of course, was Syria and Syria's role in Lebanon and Lebanon's role in the Middle East and the terrorist acts that were taking place.

As a private citizen I was assisting only for a period of months. I have never heard anything like what you've read, I have no knowledge of it whatsoever, and I doubt it.

BYRD. You doubt what?

RUMSFELD. The questions you posed as to whether the United States of America assisted Iraq with the elements that you listed in your reading of Newsweek and that we could conceivably now be reaping what we've sown.

I think—I doubt both.

BYRD. Are you surprised that this is what I've said? Are you surprised at this story in Newsweek?

RUMSFELD. I guess I'm at an age and circumstance in life where I'm no longer surprised about what I hear in the newspapers.

BYRD. That's not the question, I'm of that age, too. Somewhat older than you, but how about that story I've read?

RUMSFELD. I see stories all the time that are flat wrong. I just don't know. All I can say . . .

BYRD. How about this story? This story? How about this story, specifically?

RUMSFELD. As I say, I have not read it, I listened carefully to what you said and I doubt it.

BYRD. All right.

Now the Washington Post reported this morning that the United States is stepping away from efforts to strengthen the Biological Weapons Convention. Are we not sending exactly the wrong signal to the world, at exactly the wrong time?

BYRD. Doesn't this damage our credibility in the international community at the very time that we are seeking their support to neutralize the threat of Iraq's biological weapons program? If we supplied, as the Newsweek article said, if we supplied the building blocks for germ and chemical warfare to this madman in the first place, this psychopath, how do we look to the world to be backing away from this effort to control it at this point?

RUMSFELD. Senator, I think it would be a shame to leave this committee and the people listening with the impression that the United States assisted Iraq with chemical or biological weapons in the 1980s. I just do not believe that's the case.

BYRD. Well, are you saying that the Newsweek article is inaccurate?

RUMSFELD. I'm saying precisely what I said, that I didn't read the Newsweek article, but that I doubt it's accurate.

BYRD. I'll be glad to send you up a copy.

RUMSFELD. But that I was not in government at that time, except as a special envoy for a period of months. So one ought not to rely on me as the best source as to what happened in that mid-'80s period that you were describing.

I will say one other thing. On two occasions I believe when you read that article, you mentioned the IAEC, which as I recall is the International Atomic Energy Commission, and mentioned that if some of the things that you were talking about were provided to them, which I found quite confusing to be honest.

With respect to the Biological Weapons Convention, I was not aware that the United States government had taken a position with respect to it. It's not surprising because it's a matter for the Department of State, not the Department of Defense.

If in fact they have indicated, as The Washington Post reports, that they are not going to move forward with a—I believe it's an enforcement regime, it's not my place to discuss the administration's position when I don't know what it is.

But I can tell you, from a personal standpoint, my recollection is that the biological convention never, never was anticipated that there would even be thought of to have an enforcement regime. And that an enforcement regime on something like that, where there are a lot of countries involved who are on the terrorist list who were participants in that convention, that the United States has, over a period of administrations, believed that it would not be a good idea, because the United States would be a net loser from an enforcement regime.

But that is not the administration's position. I just don't know what the administration's position is.

LEVIN. We're going to have to leave it there, because you're way over.

BYRD. This is a very important question.

LEVIN. It is indeed, and you're over time, I agree with you on the importance, but you're way over time, sir.

BYRD. I know I'm over time, but are we going to leave this in question out there dangling?

LEVIN. One last question.

BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that I may have an additional five minutes.

LEVIN. No, I'm afraid you can't do that. If you could just do one last—well, wait a minute, ask unanimous consent, I can't stop you from doing that.

(UNKNOWN). I object.

(LAUGHTER)

BYRD. Mr. Chairman?

LEVIN. Just one last question. Would that be all right so you could wind that up?

Senator Byrd, if you could just take one additional question.

BYRD. I've never—I've been in this Congress 50 years. I've never objected to another senator having a few additional minutes.

Now Mr. Chairman, I think that the secretary should have a copy of this report, this story that—from Newsweek that I've been querying him about. I think he has a right to look at that.

LEVIN. Could somebody take that out to the secretary?

BYRD. Now, while that's being given to the secretary, Mr. Secretary, I think we're put into an extremely bad position before the world today if we're going to walk away from an international effort to strengthen the Biological Weapons Convention against germ warfare, advising its allies that the U.S. wants to delay further discussions until 2006. Especially in the light of the Newsweek story; I think we bear some responsibility.

INHOFE. Mr. Chairman I ask for a point of order.

LEVIN. Can we just have this be the last question, if you would just go along with us please, Senator Inhofe?

INHOFE. I'll only say though, in all respect to the Senator from West Virginia, we have a number of senators here. We have a limited time of six minutes each, and we're entitled to have our six minutes. That should be a short questions if it's the last question.

LEVIN. If we could just make that the last question and answer, I would appreciate it. The chair would appreciate the cooperation of all senators.

Secretary Rumsfeld, could you answer that question please?

RUMSFELD. I'll do my best.

Senator, I just in glancing at this, and I hesitate to do this because I have not read it carefully.

But it says here that, "According to confidential Commerce Department export control documents obtained by Newsweek, the shopping list included." It did not say that there were deliveries of these things. It said that Iran—Iraq asked for these things. It talks about a shopping list.

Second, in listing these things, it says that they wanted television cameras for video surveillance applications, chemical analysis equipment for the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission, the IAEC—and that may very well be the Iraqi Atomic Energy Commission, which would be—mean that my earlier comment would not be correct, because I thought it was the International Atomic Energy Commission. But this seems to indicate it's the Iraq Commerce Commission.

BYRD. Mr. Chairman, may I say to my friend from Oklahoma, I'm amazed that he himself wouldn't yield me time for this important question. I would do the same for him.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask . . .

(CLELAND). I yield my five minutes, Senator.

BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the secretary—and I don't just like to ask him—I asked him to review Pentagon records to see if the Newsweek article is true or not. Will the secretary do that?

RUMSFELD. It appears that they're Department of Commerce records, as opposed to Pentagon. But I can certainly ask that the Department of Commerce and, to the extent that it's relevant, the Department of State, look into it and see if we can't determine the accuracy or inaccuracy of some aspects of this. Yes, sir.

LEVIN. And we go one step further than that. I think the request is that the Defense Department search its records. Will you do that?

RUMSFELD. We'll be happy to search ours, but this refers to the Commerce Department.

LEVIN. We will ask the State Department and the Commerce Department to do the same thing.

RUMSFELD. We'd be happy to.

LEVIN. And we will also ask the Intelligence Committee to stage a briefing for all of us on that issue, so that Senator Byrd's question . . .

BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman.

LEVIN. Thank you very much, Senator.

BYRD. I thank the secretary.

RUMSFELD. Thank you.

LEVIN. Senator Byrd, we will ask Senator Graham and Senator Shelby to hold a briefing on that subject, because it is a very important subject.

BYRD. I thank the chairman.

U.S. DROPS BID TO STRENGTHEN GERM WARFARE ACCORD

(By Peter Slevin)

The Bush administration has abandoned an international effort to strengthen the Biological Weapons Convention against germ warfare, advising its allies that the United States wants to delay further discussions until 2006. A review conference on new verification measures for the treaty has been scheduled for November.

Less than a year after a State Department envoy abruptly pulled out of biowarfare negotiations in Geneva, promising that the United States would return with new proposals, the administration has concluded that treaty revisions favored by the European Union and scores of other countries will not work and should not be salvaged, administration officials said yesterday.

The decision, which has been conveyed to allies in recent weeks, has been greeted with warnings that the move will weaken attempts to curb germ warfare programs at a time when biological weapons are a focus of concern because of the war on terrorism and the administration's threats to launch a military campaign against Iraq. It also comes as the administration, which has angered allies by rejecting a series of multilateral agreements, is appealing to the international community to work with it in forging a new U.N. Security Council resolution on Iraq's programs to develop weapons of mass destruction.

The 1972 Biological Weapons Convention, which has been ratified by the United States and 143 other countries, bans the development, stockpiling and production of germ warfare agents, but has no enforcement mechanism. Negotiations on legally binding measures to enforce compliance have been underway in Geneva for seven years.

The administration stunned its allies last December by proposing to end the negotiators' mandate, saying that while the treaty needed strengthening, the enforcement protocol under discussion would not deter enemy nations from acquiring or developing biological weapons if they were determined to do so. Negotiators suspended the discussions, saying they would meet again in November when U.S. officials said they would return with creative solutions to address the impasse.

Instead, U.S. envoys are now telling allies that the administration's position is so different from the views of the leading supporters of the enforcement protocol that a meeting would dissolve into public squabbling and should be avoided, administration officials said. Better, they said, to halt discussions altogether.

"It's based on an incorrect approach. Our concern is that it would be fundamentally ineffective," a State Department official said. Another administration official said the "best and least contentious" approach would be to hold a very brief meeting in November—or even no meeting at all—and talk again when the next review is scheduled four years from now.

Amy Smithson, a biological and chemical weapons specialist, said the administration is making a mistake by halting collaborative work to strengthen the convention. "It sounds to me as though they've thrown the baby out with the bath water," said Smithson, an analyst at the Henry L. Stimson Center. "The contradiction between the rhetoric and what the administration is actually doing—the gulf is huge. Not a day goes by when they don't mention the Iraq threat."

The Stimson Center is releasing a report today that criticizes the U.S. approach to the convention. Drawn from a review by 10 pharmaceutical companies and biotechnology experts, the document argues that bioweapons inspections can be effective with the right amount of time and the right science and urges the administration to develop stronger measures.

"To argue that this wouldn't be a useful remedy would just be a mistake. I think it's because they're looking through the wrong end of the telescope," said Matthew Meselson, a Harvard biologist who helped draft a treaty to criminalize biological weapons violations. "We're denying ourselves useful tools."

The administration has focused publicly on a half-dozen countries identified by the State Department as pursuing germ warfare programs. Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton said the existence of Iraq's bioweapons project is "beyond dispute." The U.S. government also believes Iran, North Korea, Sudan, Libya and Syria are developing such weapons, he said.

Meselson concurred with the administration's position that a limited enforcement provision for the bioweapons treaty could not provide confidence that countries are staying clean. But he said that a pact establishing standards and verification measures would deter some countries while also helping to build norms of international behavior.

Bolton, on the other hand, told delegates to last year's review conference that "the time for 'better-than-nothing' protocols is over. We will continue to reject flawed texts like the BWC draft protocol, recommended to us simply because they are the product of lengthy negotiations or arbitrary deadlines, if such texts are not in the best interests of the United States."

With only hours to go at the meeting, Bolton stopped U.S. participation in the final negotiations. He said of the resulting one-year delay, "This gives us time to think creatively on alternatives."

In Bolton's view, each country should develop criminal laws against germ warfare activities, develop export controls for dangerous pathogens, establish codes of conduct for scientists and install strict biosafety procedures. The administration has proposed that governments resolve disputes over biowarfare violations among themselves, perhaps through voluntary inspections or by referral to the United Nations secretary general.

Such an approach is "at best ineffectual," said the specialists gathered by the Stimson Center. At worst, they concluded, the approach could damage U.S. interests because it would not be structured to deliver "meaningful monitoring."

"If a challenge inspection system is not geared to pursue violators aggressively, then it does not serve U.S. security interests," the 65-page report states. The participants strongly favored establishing mandatory standards backed by penalties and "robust" inspections, which goes significantly further than the proposed protocol backed by the EU and other nations.

The State Department Web site has not yet been changed to reflect the change in policy. It says, "The United States is committed to strengthening the BWC as part of a comprehensive and multidisciplinary strategy for combating the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and international terrorism. . . . We would like to share these ideas with our international partners."

PARTIAL TRANSCRIPT FROM SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE, SEPTEMBER 19, 2002

LEVIN. Senator Byrd?

BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for holding these hearings.

Mr. Secretary, to your knowledge, did the United States help Iraq to acquire the building blocks of biological weapons during the Iran-Iraq War? Are we, in fact, now facing the possibility of reaping what we have sown?

RUMSFELD. Certainly not to my knowledge. I have no knowledge of United States companies or government being involved in assisting Iraq develop chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

HOW SADDAM HAPPENED

(By Christopher Dickey and Evan Thomas)

The last time Donald Rumsfeld saw Saddam Hussein, he gave him a cordial handshake. The date was almost 20 years ago, Dec. 20, 1983; an official Iraqi television crew recorded the historic moment.

The once and future Defense secretary, at the time a private citizen, had been sent by President Ronald Reagan to Baghdad as a special envoy. Saddam Hussein, armed with a pistol on his hip, seemed "vigorous and confident," according to a new declassified State Department cable obtained by Newsweek. Rumsfeld "conveyed the President's greetings and expressed his pleasure at being in Baghdad," wrote the notetaker. Then the two men got down to business, talking about the need to improve relations between their two countries.

Like most foreign-policy insiders, Rumsfeld was aware that Saddam was a murderous thug who supported terrorists and was trying to build a nuclear weapon. (The Israelis had already bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor at Osirak.) But at the time, America's big worry was Iran, not Iraq. The Reagan administration feared that the Iranian revolutionaries who had overthrown the shah (and taken hostage American diplomats for 444 days in 1979–81) would overrun the Middle East and its vital oilfields. On the theory that the enemy of my enemy is my friend, the Reaganites were seeking to support Iraq in a long and bloody war against Iran. The meeting between Rumsfeld and Saddam was consequential: for the next five years, until Iran finally capitulated, the United States backed Saddam's armies with military intelligence, economic aid and covert supplies of munitions.

FORMER ALLIES

Rumsfeld is not the first American diplomat to wish for the demise of a former ally. After all, before the cold war, the Soviet Union was America's partner against Hitler in World War II. In the real world, as the saying goes, nations have no permanent friends, just permanent interests. Nonetheless, Rumsfeld's long-ago interlude with Saddam is a reminder that today's friend can be tomorrow's mortal threat. As President George W. Bush and his war cabinet ponder Saddam's successor's regime, they would do well to contemplate how and why the last three presidents allowed the Butcher of Baghdad to stay in power so long.

The history of America's relations with Saddam is one of the sorrier tales in American foreign policy. Time and again, America turned a blind eye to Saddam's predations, saw him as the lesser evil or flinched at the chance to unseat him. No single policymaker or administration deserves blame for creating, or at least tolerating, a monster; many of their decisions seemed reasonable at the time. Even so, there are moments in this clumsy dance with the Devil that make one cringe. It is hard to believe that, during most of the 1980s, America knowingly permitted the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission to import bacterial cultures that might be used to build biological weapons. But it happened.

America's past stumbles, while embarrassing, are not an argument for inaction in the future. Saddam probably is the "grave and gathering danger" described by President Bush in his speech to the United Nations last week. It may also be true that "whoever replaces Saddam is not going to be worse," as a senior administration official put it to Newsweek. But the story of how America helped create a Frankenstein monster it now wishes to strangle is sobering. It illustrates the power of wishful thinking, as well as the iron law of unintended consequences.

TRANSFIXED BY SADDAM

America did not put Saddam in power. He emerged after two decades of turmoil in the '60s and '70s, as various strongmen tried to gain control of a nation that had been concocted by British imperialists in the 1920s out of three distinct and rival factions, the Sunnis, Shiites and the Kurds. But during the cold war, America competed with the Soviets for Saddam's attention and welcomed his war with the religious fanatics of Iran. Having cozied up to Saddam, Washington. . . .

While the Middle East is unlikely to become a democratic nirvana, the worst-case scenarios, always a staple of the press, are probably also wrong or exaggerated. Assuming that a cornered and doomed Saddam does not kill thousands of Americans in some kind of horrific Götterdämmerung—a scary possibility, one that deeply worries administration officials—the greatest risk of his fall is that one strongman may simply be replaced by another. Saddam's successor may not be a paranoid sadist. But there is no assurance that he will be America's friend or forswear the development of weapons of mass destruction.

A TASTE FOR NASTY WEAPONS

American officials have known that Saddam was a psychopath ever since he became the country's de facto ruler in the early 1970s. One of Saddam's early acts after he took the title of president in 1979 was to videotape a session of his party's congress, during which he personally ordered several members executed on the spot. The message, carefully conveyed to the Arab press, was not that these men were executed for plotting against Saddam, but rather for thinking about plotting against him. From the beginning, U.S. officials worried about Saddam's taste for nasty weaponry; indeed, at their meeting in 1983, Rumsfeld warned that Saddam's use of chemical weapons might "inhibit" American assistance. But top officials in the Reagan administration saw Saddam as a useful surrogate. By going to war with Iran, he could bleed the radical mullahs who had seized control of Iran from the pro-American shah. Some Reagan officials even saw Saddam as another Anwar Sadat, capable of making Iran into a modern secular state, just as Sadat had tried to lift up Egypt before his assassination in 1981.

But Saddam had to be rescued first. The war against Iran was going badly by 1982. Iran's "human wave attacks" threatened to overrun Saddam's armies. Washington decided to give Iraq a helping hand. After Rumsfeld's visit to Baghdad in 1983, U.S. intelligence began supplying the Iraqi dictator with satellite photos showing Iranian deployments. Official documents suggest that America may also have secretly arranged for tanks and other military hardware to be shipped to Iraq in a swap deal—American tanks to Egypt, Egyptian tanks to Iraq. Over the protest of some Pentagon skeptics, the Reagan administration began allowing the Iraqis to buy a wide variety of "dual use" equipment and materials from American suppliers. According to confidential Commerce Department export-control documents obtained by Newsweek, the shopping list included a computerized database for Saddam's Interior Ministry (presumably to help keep track of political opponents); helicopters to transport Iraqi officials; television cameras for "video surveillance applications"; chemical-analysis equipment for the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission (IAEC), and, most unsettling, numerous shipments of "bacteria/fungi/protozoa" to the IAEC. According to former officials, the bacteria cultures could be used to make biological weapons, including anthrax. The State Department also approved the shipment of 1.5 million atropine injectors, for use against the effects of chemical weapons, but the Pentagon blocked the sale. The helicopters, some American officials later surmised, were used to spray poison gas on the Kurds.

"WHO IS GOING TO SAY ANYTHING?"

The United States almost certainly knew from its own satellite imagery that Saddam was using chemical weapons against Iranian troops. When Saddam bombed Kurdish rebels and civilians with a lethal cocktail of mustard gas, sarin, tabun and VX in 1988, the Reagan administration first blamed Iran, before acknowledging, under pressure from congressional Democrats, that the culprits were Saddam's own forces. There was only token official protest at the time. Saddam's men were unfazed. An Iraqi audiotape, later captured by the Kurds, records Saddam's cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid (known as Ali Chemical) talking to his fellow officers about gassing the Kurds. "Who is going to say anything?" he asks. "The international community? F—k them!"

The United States was much more concerned with protecting Iraqi oil from attacks by Iran as it was shipped through the Persian Gulf. In 1987, an Iraqi Exocet missile hit an American destroyer, the USS Stark, in the Persian Gulf, killing 37 crewmen. Incredibly, the United States excused Iraq for making an unintentional mistake and instead used the incident to accuse Iran of escalating the war in the gulf. The American tilt to Iraq became more pronounced. U.S. commandos began blowing up Iranian oil platforms and attacking Iranian patrol boats. In 1988, an American warship in the gulf accidentally shot down an Iranian Airbus, killing 290 civilians. Within a few weeks, Iran, exhausted and fearing American intervention, gave up its war with Iraq.

Saddam was feeling cocky. With the support of the West, he had defeated the Islamic revolutionaries in Iran. America favored him as a regional pillar. European and American corporations were vying for contracts with Iraq. He was visited by congressional delegations led by Sens. Bob Dole of Kansas and Alan Simpson of Wyoming, who were eager to promote American farm and business interests. But Saddam's megalomania was on the rise, and he overplayed his hand. In 1990, a U.S. Customs sting operation snared several Iraqi agents who were trying to buy electronic equipment used to make triggers for nuclear bombs. Not long after, Saddam gained the world's attention by threatening "to burn Israel to the ground." At the Pentagon, analysts began to warn that Saddam was a growing menace, especially after he tried to buy some American-made high-tech furnaces useful for making nuclear-bomb parts. Yet other officials in Congress and in the Bush administration continued to see him as a useful, if distasteful, regional strongman. The State Department was equivocating with Saddam right up to the moment he invaded Kuwait in August 1990.

AMBIVALENT ABOUT SADDAM'S FATE

Some American diplomats suggest that Saddam might have gotten away with invading Kuwait if he had not been quite so greedy. "If he had pulled back to the Mutla Ridge [overlooking Kuwait City], he'd still be there today," one ex-ambassador told Newsweek. And even though President George H.W. Bush compared Saddam to Hitler and sent a half-million-man Army to drive him from Kuwait, Washington remained ambivalent about Saddam's fate. It was widely assumed by policymakers that Saddam would collapse after his defeat in Desert Storm, done in by him humiliated officer corps or overthrown by the revolt of a restive minority population. But Washington did not want to push very hard to topple Saddam. The gulf war, Bush I administration officials pointed out, had been fought to liberate Kuwait, not oust Saddam. "I am certain that had we taken all of Iraq, we would have been like the dinosaur in the tar pit—we would still be there," wrote the American commander in Desert Storm, Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf, in his memoirs. America's allies in the region, most prominently Saudi Arabia, feared that a post-Saddam Iraq would splinter and destabilize the region. The Shiites in the south might bond with their fellow religionists in Iran, strengthening the Shiite mullahs, and threatening the Saudi border. In the north, the Kurds were agitating to break off parts of Iraq and Turkey to create a Kurdistan. So Saddam was allowed to keep his tanks and helicopters—which he used to crush both Shiite and Kurdish rebellions.

The Bush administration played down Saddam's darkness after the gulf war. Pentagon bureaucrats compiled dossiers to support a war-crimes prosecution of Saddam, especially for his sordid treatment of POWs. They documented police stations and "sports facilities" where Saddam's henchmen used acid baths and electric drills on their victims. One document suggested that torture should be "artistic." But top Defense Department officials stamped the report secret. One Bush administration official subsequently told The Washington Post, "Some people were concerned that if we released it during the [1992 presidential] campaign, people would say, 'Why don't you bring this guy to justice?'" (Defense Department aides say politics played no part in the report.)

The Clinton administration was no more aggressive toward Saddam. In 1993, Saddam apparently hired some Kuwaiti liquor smugglers to try to assassinate former president Bush as he took a victory lap through the region. According to one former U.S. ambassador, the new administration was less than eager to see an open-and-shut case against Saddam, for fear that it would demand aggressive retaliation. When American intelligence continued to point to Saddam's role, the Clintonites lobbed a few cruise missiles into Baghdad. The attack reportedly killed one of Saddam's mistresses, but left the dictator defiant.

CLINTON-ERA COVERT ACTIONS

The American intelligence community, under orders from President Bill Clinton, did mount covert actions aimed at toppling Saddam in the 1990s, but by most accounts they were badly organized and halfhearted. In the north, CIA operatives supported a Kurdish rebellion against Saddam in 1995. According to the CIA's man on the scene, former case officer Robert Baer, Clinton administration officials back in Washington "pulled the plug" on the operation just as it was gathering momentum. The reasons have long remained murky, but according to Baer, Washington was never sure that Saddam's successor would be an improvement, or that Iraq wouldn't simply collapse into chaos. "The question we could never answer," Baer told Newsweek, "was, 'After Saddam goes, then what?'" A coup attempt by Iraqi Army officers fizzled the next year. Saddam brutally rolled up the plotters. The CIA operatives pulled out, rescuing everyone they could, and sending them to Guam.

Meanwhile, Saddam was playing cat-and-mouse with weapons of mass destruction. As part of the settlement imposed by America and its allies at the end of the gulf war, Saddam was supposed to get rid of his existing stockpiles of chem-bio weapons, and to allow in inspectors to make sure none were being hidden or secretly manufactured. The U.N. inspectors did shut down his efforts to build a nuclear weapon. But Saddam continued to secretly work on his germ- and chemical-warfare program. When the inspectors first suspected what Saddam was trying to hide in 1995, Saddam's son-in-law, Hussein Kamel, suddenly fled Iraq to Jordan. Kamel had overseen Saddam's chem-bio program, and his defection forced the revelation of some of the secret locations of Saddam's deadly labs. That evidence is the heart of the "white paper" used last week by President Bush to support his argument that Iraq has been defying U.N. resolutions for the past decade. (Kamel had the bad judgment to return to Iraq, where he was promptly executed, along with various family members.)

By now aware of the scale of Saddam's efforts to deceive, the U.N. arms inspectors were unable to certify that Saddam was no longer making weapons of mass destruction. Without this guarantee, the United Nations was unwilling to lift the economic sanctions imposed after the gulf war. Saddam continued to play "cheat and retreat" with—the inspectors, forcing a showdown in December 1998. The United Nations pulled out its inspectors, and the United States and Britain launched Operation Desert Fox, four days of bombing that was supposed to teach Saddam a lesson and force his compliance.

Saddam thumbed his nose. The United States and its allies, in effect, shrugged and walked away. While the U.N. sanctions regime gradually eroded, allowing Saddam to trade easily on the black market, he was free to brew all the chem-bio weapons he wanted. Making a nuclear weapon is harder, and intelligence officials still believe he is a few years away from even regaining the capacity to manufacture enriched uranium to build his own bomb. If he can steal or buy ready-made fissile material, say from the Russian mafia, he could probably make a nuclear weapon in a matter of months, though it would be so large that delivery would pose a challenge.

LASHING OUT?

As the Bush administration prepares to oust Saddam, one way or another, senior administration officials are very worried that Saddam will try to use his WMD arsenal Intelligence experts have warned that Saddam may be "flushing" his small, easy-to-conceal biological agents, trying to get them out of the country before an American invasion. A vial of bugs or toxins that could kill thousands could fit in a suitcase—or a diplomatic pouch. There are any number of grim end-game scenarios. Saddam could try blackmail, threatening to unleash smallpox or some other grotesque virus in an American city if U.S. forces invaded. Or, like a cornered dog, he could lash out in a final spasm of violence, raining chemical weapons down on U.S. troops, handing out his bioweapons to terrorists. "That's the single biggest worry in all this," says a senior administration official. "We are spending a lot of time on this," said another top official.

Some administration critics have said, in effect, let sleeping dogs lie. Don't provoke Saddam by threatening his life; there is no evidence that he has the capability to deliver weapons of mass destruction. Countered White House national-security adviser Condoleezza Rice, "Do we wait until he's better at it?" Several administration officials indicated that an intense effort is underway, covert as well as overt, to warn Saddam's lieutenants to save themselves by breaking from the dictator before it's too late. "Don't be the fool who follows the last order" is the way one senior administration official puts it.

The risk is that some will choose to go down with Saddam, knowing that they stand to be hanged by an angry mob after the dictator falls. It is unclear what kind of justice would follow his fall, aside from summary hangings from the nearest lamppost.

POST-SADDAM IRAQ

The Bush administration is determined not to "overthrow one strongman only to install another," a senior administration official told Newsweek. This official said that the president has made clear that he wants to press for democratic institutions, government accountability and the rule of law in post-Saddam Iraq. But no one really knows how that can be achieved. Bush's advisers are counting on the Iraqis themselves to resist a return to despotism. "People subject to horrible tryanny have strong antibodies to anyone who wants to put them back under tyranny," says a senior administration official. But as another official acknowledged, "a substantial American commitment" to Iraq is inevitable.

At what cost? And who pays? Will other nations chip in money and men? It is not clear how many occupation troops will be required to maintain order, or for how long. Much depends on the manner of Saddam's exit: whether the Iraqis drive him out themselves, or rely heavily on U.S. power. Administration officials shy away from timeables and specifies but say they have to be prepared for all contingencies. "As General Eisenhower said, 'Every plan gets thrown out on the first day of battle. Plans are useless. Planning is everything'," said Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, I, Lewis (Scooter) Libby.

It is far from clear that America will be able to control the next leader of Iraq, even if he is not as diabolical as Saddam. Any leader of Iraq will look around him and see that Israel and Pakistan have nuclear weapons and that Iran may soon. Just as England and France opted to build their own bombs in the cold war, and not depend on the U.S. nuclear umbrella, the next president of Iraq may want to have his own bomb. "He may want to, but he can't be allowed to," says a Bush official. But what is to guarantee that a newly rich Iraqi strongman won't buy one with his nation's vast oil wealth? In some ways, Iraq is to the Middle East as Germany was to Europe in the 20th century, too large, too militaristic and too competent to coexit peacebly with neighbors. It took two world wars and millions of lives to solve "the German problem." Getting rid of Saddam may be essential to creating a stable, democratic Iraq. But it may be only a first step on a long and dangerous march.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH & HUMAN SERVICES, CENTERS FOR DISEASE CONTROL AND PREVENTION,
Atlanta, GA, June 21, 1995.

Hon. DONALD W. RIEGLE, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR RIEGLE: In 1993, at your request, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) forwarded to your office a listing of all biological materials, including viruses, retroviruses, bacteria, and fungi, which CDC provided to the government of Iraq from October 1, 1984, through October 13, 1993. Recently, in the course of reviewing our shipping records for a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request from a private citizen, we identified an additional shipment, on May 21, 1985, that was not included on the list that was provided to your office. Following this discovery, we conducted a thorough review of all of our shipping records and are confident that we have now included a listing of all shipments. A corrected list is enclosed (Note: the new information is italicized).

These additional materials were hand-carried by Dr. Mohammad Mahoud to Iraq after he had spent three months training in a CDC laboratory. Most of the materials were non-infectious diagnostic reagents for detecting evidence of infections to mosquito-borne viruses. Only two of the materials are on the Commodity Control List, i.e., Yersinin Pestis (the agent of plague) and dengue virus. (the strain of plague bacillus was non-virulent, and CDC is currently petitioning the Department of Commerce to remove this particular variant from the list of controlled materials).

We regret that our earlier list was incomplete and appreciate your understanding.

Sincerely,

DAVID SATCHER,
Director.

U.S. EXPORTS OF BIOLOGICAL MATERIALS TO IRAQ

The Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs has oversight responsibility for the Export Administration Act. Pursuant to the Act, Committee staff contacted the U.S. Department of Commerce and requested information on the export of biological materials during the years prior to the Gulf War. After receiving this information, we contacted a principal supplier of these materials to determine what, if any, materials were exported to Iraq which might have contributed to an offensive or defensive biological warfare program. Records available from the supplier for the period from 1985 until the present show that during this time, pathogenic (meaning "disease producing"), toxigenic (meaning "poisonous"), and other biological research materials were exported to Iraq pursuant to application and licensing by the U.S. Department of Commerce. Records prior to 1985 were not available, according to the supplier. These exported biological materials were not attenuated or weakened and were capable of reproduction. According to the Department of Defense's own Report to Congress on the Conduct of the Persian Gulf War, released in April 1992:

"By the time of the invasion of Kuwait, Iraq had developed biological weapons. It's advanced and aggressive biological warfare program was the most advanced in the Arab world. The program probably began late in the 1970's and concentrated on the development of two agents, botulinum toxin and anthrax bacteria. . . . Large scale production of these agents began in 1989 at four facilities near Baghdad. Delivery means for biological agents ranged from simple aerial bombs and artillery rockets to surface-to-surface missiles."

Included in the approved sales are the following biological materials (which have been considered by various nations for use in war), with their associated disease symptoms:

Bacillus Anthracis: anthrax is a disease-producing bacteria identified by the Department of Defense in the The Conduct of the Persian Gulf War: Final Report to Congress, as being a major component in the Iraqi biological warfare program.

Anthrax is an often-fatal infectious disease due to ingestion of spores. It begins abruptly with high fever, difficulty in breathing, and chest pain. The disease eventually results in septicemia (blood poisoning), and the mortality is high. Once septicemia is advanced, antibiotic therapy may prove useless, probably because the exotoxins remain, despite the death of the bacteria.

Clostridium Botulinum: a baterial source of botulinum toxin, which causes vomiting, constipation, thirst, general weakness, headache, fever, dizziness, double vision, dilation of the pupils and paralysis of the muscles involving swallowing. It is often fatal.

Histoplasma Capsulatum: causes a disease superficially resembling tuberculosis that may cause pneumonia, enlargement of the liver and spleen, anemia, an influenza-like illness and an acute inflammatory skin disease marked by tender red modules, usually on the shins. Reactivated infection usually involves the lungs, the brain, spinal membranes, heart, peritoneum, and the adrenals.

Brucella Melitensis: a bacterial which can cause chronic fatigue, loss of appetite, profuse sweating when at rest, pain in joints and muscles, insomnia, nausea, and damage to major organs.

Clostridium Perfringens: a highly toxic bacteria which causes gas gangrene. The bacteria produce toxins that move along muscle bundles in the body killing cells and producing necrotic tissue that is then favorable for further growth of the bacteria itself. Eventually, these toxins and bacteria enter the bloodstream and cause systemic illness.

In addition, several shipments of Escherichia Coli (E.Coli) and genetic materials, as well as human and bacterial DNA, were shipped directly to the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission.

The following is a detailed listing of biological materials, provided by the American Type Culture Collection, which were exported to agencies of the government of Iraq pursuant to the issuance of an export licensed by the U.S. Commerce Department:

UNSCOM BIOLOGICAL WARFARE INSPECTIONS

UNSCOM inspections uncovered evidence that the government of Iraq was conducting research on pathogen enhancement on the following biological warfare-related materials: bacillus anthracis; clostridium botulinum; clostridium perfirgens; brucella abortis; brucella melentensis; francisella tularensis; and clostridium tetani.

In addition, the UNSCOM inspections revealed that biological warfare-related stimulant research was being conducted on the following materials: bacillus subtillus; bacillus ceres; and bacillus megatillus.

UNSCOM reported to Committee staff that a biological warfare inspection (BW3) was conducted at the Iraq Atomic Energy Commission in 1993. This suggests that the Iraqi government may have been experimenting with the materials cited above (E. coli and rDNA) in an effort to create genetically altered microorganisms (novel biological warfare agents). Committee staff plans to interview the BW3 team leader, Col. David Franz of the United States Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases (USAMRIID) in the near future. This phase of the investigation continues.

BIOLOGICAL WARFARE DEFENSE

The following section, describing the types, dissemination, and defensive measures against biological agents, is quoted verbatim from a United States Marine Corps Institute document, Nuclear and Chemical Operations, MCI 7711B, used in the Command and Staff College's nonresident program. It is clear from this document that the Department of Defense recognizes both the threat and U.S. vulnerability to biological weapons. This document also outlines the Department's understanding of what actions should be taken in the event that a biological weapon has been or is suspected to have been employed.

"Biological agents cannot be detected by the human senses. A person could become a casualty before he is aware he has been exposed to a biological agent. An aerosol or mist of biological agent is borne in the air. These agents can silently and effectively attack man, animals, plants, and in some cases, materiel. Agents can be tailored for a specific type of target.

Methods of using antipersonnel agents undoubtedly vary so that no uniform pattern of employment or operation is evident. It is likely that agents will be used in combinations so that the disease symptoms will confuse diagnosis and interfere with proper treatment. It is also probable that biological agents would be used in heavy concentrations to insure a high percentage of infection in the target area. The use of such concentrations could result in the breakdown of individual immunity because the large number of micro-organisms entering the body could overwhelm the natural body defenses.

Types of biological agents

Different antipersonnel agents require varying periods of time before they take effect, and the periods of time for which they will incapacitate a person also vary. Most of the diseases having antipersonnel employment potential are found among groups of diseases that are naturally transmitted between animals and man. Mankind is highly vulnerable to them since he has little contact with animals in today's urban society. The micro-organisms of possible use in warfare are found in four naturally occurring groups—the fungi, bacteria, ricketisiae, and viruses.

a. Fungi. Fungi occur in many forms and are found almost everywhere. They range in size from a single cell, such as yeast, to multicellular forms, such as mushrooms and puffballs. Their greatest employment potential is against plants, although some forms cause disease in man. A fungus causes the disease coccidioidomycosis in man. Other common infections caused by Fungi include ringworm and "athletes foot."

b. Bacteria. Bacteria comprise a large and varied group of organisms. They occur in varying shapes, such as rods, spheres, and spirals, but they are all one-celled plants. Some bacteria can assume a resistant structure called a spore, which enables them to resist adverse environmental conditions. Others may produce poisonous substances called toxins. Examples of human disease caused by bacteria are anthrax, brucellosis, tularemia, staphylococcus, and streptococcus.

c. Rickettsiae. Rickettsiae organisms have the physical appearances of bacteria and the growth characteristics of viruses. Members of this group must have living tissue for growth and reproduction, whereas most fungi and bacteria can be grown on artificial material. Another characteristic of rickettsiae is that most diseases caused by this group are transmitted by the bite of an insect, such as the mosquito, mite, or tick. Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever, Q fever, and typhus are diseases of mankind caused by rickettsiae.

d. Virus. The smallest living things known to mankind are virsuses. Viruses are so small that an electron microscope is required to see them. Viruses cannot be grown in the absence of living tissue. Diseases which are caused by viruses cannot normally be treated with antibiotics. Viruses cause yellow fever, rabies, and poliomyelitis.

Dissemination of biological agents

a. Aerosol. Biological agents may be disseminated on, or over, the target by many means, such as aircraft, missiles, and explosive munitions. These devices produce a biological aerosol, and, if antipersonnel biological agents are ever used, they will probably be disseminated in the form of biological mists or aerosols. This method of dissemination would be extremely effective because the micro-organisms would be drawn into the lungs as a person breathes, and there they would be rapidly absorbed into the blood stream. The hours from dusk until dawn appear to be the best time for dissemination of biological agents. The weather conditions are most favorable for these agents at night, since sunlight will destroy many of them. In field trials, using harmless biological aerosols, area coverages of thousands of square miles have been accomplished. The aerosol particles were carried for long distances by air currents. (emphasis added)

b. Living Hosts. Personnel may be infected by disease carrying vectors, such as insects, rats, or other animals. Mosquitos may spread malaria, yellow fever, or encephalitis; rats spread plague (any mammal may carry rabies). Militarily, specific vectors may be selected, infected as required, and then released in the target area to seek out their human victims and pass on the disease. Since infection is transmitted through a bite in the skin, protective masks offer no protection. A vectorborne agent may remain in the target area for as long as there are live hosts; thus, a major disadvantage results. The vectorborne agent can become a permanent hazard in the area as the host infects others of his species.

c. Food and Water Contamination. Biological agents could also be delivered to target personnel by placing the agent in food and water supplies (sabotage). This type of attack would probably be directed against small targets, such as industrial complexes, headquarters, or specific individuals. The methods of delivering the attack are many and varied.

Defensive Measures

The United States carries out research aimed at improved means of detection of biological agents and treatment and immunization of personnel. Both of these are essential to biological defense.

a. Before an Attack. The inability of the individual to detect a biological attack is perhaps the greatest problem. Contributing factors are the delay experienced before the onset of symptoms and the time required to identify specific agents. Without an adequate means of detection, complete defensive measures may not be taken since an attack must first be detected before you can defend against it. Diseases caused by biological agents do not appear until a few days to weeks after contact with the agent. Personnel are protected against biological agents in aerosol form by the protective mask. Ordinary clothing protects the skin from contamination by biological agents. Other means of protection include immunizations; quarantining contaminated areas; cleanliness of the body, clothing, and living quarters; stringent rodent and pest control; proper care of cuts and wounds; and education of troops to eat and drink only from approved sources.

b. After an Attack: After a biological agent attack has occurred, it will be necessary to identify the agent used in the attack so that proper medical treatment may be given to exposed personnel. To perform this identification, it is necessary to collect samples or objects from the contaminated area and send them to a laboratory or suitable facility for processing. Samples may be taken from the air, from contaminated surfaces, or from contaminated water. After the sample is taken, laboratory time will be required to identify the suspected biological agent. The length of time for identification is being significantly shortened through the use of new medical and laboratory techniques. Proper defensive actions taken during a biological attack depend upon the rapid detection of the attack. Biological defense is continuous. You must always be prepared for the employment of these weapons. (emphasis added)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, by request of the majority leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar Order No. 543, H.R. 2121.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2121) to make available funds under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to expand democracy, good governance, and anti-corruption programs in the Russian Federation in order to promote society in that country and to support independent media.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

[SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

[This Act may be cited as the "Russian Democracy Act of 2001".

[SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

[(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

[(1) Since the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the leadership of the Russian Federation has publicly committed itself to building—

[(A) a society with democratic political institutions and practices, the observance of universally recognized standards of human rights, and religious and press freedom; and

[(B) a market economy based on internationally accepted principles of transparency, accountability, and the rule of law.

[(2) In order to facilitate this transition, the international community has provided multilateral and bilateral technical assistance, and the United States' contribution to these efforts has played an important role in developing new institutions built on democratic and liberal economic foundations and the rule of law.

[(3)(A) Since 1992, United States Government democratic reform programs and public diplomacy programs, including training, small grants, and technical assistance to independent television, radio, and print media across the Russian Federation, have strengthened nongovernment-owned media, provided access to and training in the use of the Internet, brought nearly 40,000 Russian citizens to the United States, and have led to the establishment of over 65,000 nongovernmental organizations, thousands of vibrant independent media outlets, and numerous political parties.

[(B) These efforts contributed to the substantially free and fair Russian parliamentary elections in 1995 and 1999 and Presidential elections in 1996 and 2000.

[(4) The United States has assisted Russian efforts to replace its centrally planned, state-controlled economy with a market economy and helped create institutions and infrastructure for a market economy by encouraging the transparent privatization of state-owned enterprises. Approximately two-thirds of the Russian Federation's gross domestic product is now generated by the private sector.

[(5)(A) The United States fostered grassroots entrepreneurship in the Russian Federation by focusing United States economic assistance on small- and medium-sized businesses and by providing training, consulting services, and small loans to more than 250,000 Russian entrepreneurs.

[(B) There are now more than 900,000 small businesses in the Russian Federation, producing 12 to 15 percent of the gross domestic product of the Russian Federation.

[(C) United States-funded programs help to fight corruption and financial crime, such as money laundering, by helping to—

[(i) establish a commercial legal infrastructure;

[(ii) develop an independent judiciary;

[(iii) support the drafting of a new criminal code, civil code, and bankruptcy law;

[(iv) develop a legal and regulatory framework for the Russian Federation's equivalent of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission;

[(v) support Russian law schools;

[(vi) create legal aid clinics; and

[(vii) bolster law-related activities of nongovernmental organizations.

[(6) Because the capability of Russian democratic forces and the civil society to organize and defend democratic gains without international support is uncertain, and because the gradual integration of the Russian Federation into the global order of free-market, democratic nations will further enhance Russian cooperation with the United States on a wide-range of political, economic, and security issues, the success of democracy in Russia is in the national security interest of the United States, and the United States Government should develop a far-reaching and flexible strategy aimed at strengthening Russian society's support for democracy and a market economy, particularly by enhancing Russian democratic institutions and education, promoting the rule of law, and supporting Russia's independent media.

[(7) Since the tragic events of September 11, 2001, the Russian Federation has stood with the United States and the civilized world in the struggle against terrorism and has cooperated in the war in Afghanistan by sharing intelligence and through other means.

[(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

[(1) to strengthen and advance institutions of democratic government and of a free and independent media and to sustain the development of an independent civil society in the Russian Federation based on religious and ethnic tolerance, internationally recognized human rights, and an internationally recognized rule of law; and

[(2) to focus United States foreign assistance programs on using local expertise and giving local organizations a greater role in designing and implementing such programs, while maintaining appropriate oversight and monitoring.

[(a) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of Congress that the United States Government should—

[(1) recognize that a democratic and economically stable Russian Federation is inherently less confrontational and destabilizing in its foreign policy and therefore that the promotion of democracy in Russia is in the national security interests of the United States; and

[(2) continue and increase assistance to the democratic forces in the Russian Federation, including the independent media, regional administrations, democratic political parties, and nongovernmental organizations.

[(b) STATEMENT OF POLICY.—It shall be the policy of the United States—

[(1) to facilitate Russia's integration into the Western community of nations, including supporting the establishment of a stable democracy and a market economy, and also including Russia's membership in the appropriate international institutions;

[(2) to engage the Government of Russian Federation and Russian society in order to strengthen democratic reform and institutions, and to promote good governance principles based on the internationally recognized norms of transparency in business practices, the rule of law, religious freedom, and human rights;

[(3) to advance a dialog between United States Government officials and private sector individuals and representatives of the Government of the Russian Federation regarding Russian integration into the Western community of nations;

[(4) to encourage United States Government officials and private sector individuals to meet regularly with democratic activists, human rights activists, representatives of the independent media, representatives of nongovernmental organizations, civic organizers, and reform-minded politicians from Moscow and the various regions of the Russian Federation;

[(5) to incorporate democratic reforms, the promotion of an independent media, and economic reforms in the broad United States agenda with the Government of the Russian Federation;

[(6) to encourage the Government of the Russian Federation to address cross-border issues, including the environment, crime, trafficking, and corruption in a cooperative and transparent manner consistent with internationally recognized and accepted principles of the rule of law;

[(7) to consult with the Government of the Russian Federation and the Russian Parliament on the adoption of economic and social reforms necessary to sustain Russian economic growth and to ensure Russia's transition to a fully functioning market economy;

[(8) to persuade the Government of the Russian Federation to honor its commitments made to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) at the November 1999 Istanbul Conference and to conduct a genuine good neighbor policy toward the other independent states of the former Soviet Union in the spirit of internationally accepted principles of regional cooperation; and

[(9) to encourage the G-7 partners and international financial institutions, including the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to develop financial safeguards and transparency practices in lending to the Russian Federation.

[(a) AMENDMENTS.—

[(1) DEMOCRACY AND RULE OF LAW.—Section 498(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2295(2)) is amended—

[(A) in the heading, by striking "DEMOCRACY" and inserting "DEMOCRACY AND RULE OF LAW";

[(B) by striking subparagraphs (E) and (G);

(vi) create legal aid clinics; and

(vii) bolster law-related activities of nongovernmental organizations.

(6) Because the capability of Russian democratic forces and the civil society to organize and defend democratic gains without international support is uncertain, and because the gradual integration of the Russian Federation into the global order of free-market, democratic nations would enhance Russian cooperation with the United States on a wide range of political, economic, and security issues, the success of democracy in Russia is in the national security interest of the United States, and the United States Government should develop a far-reaching and flexible strategy aimed at strengthening Russian society's support for democracy and a market economy, particularly by enhancing Russian democratic institutions and education, promoting the rule of law, and supporting Russia's independent media.

(7) Since the tragic events of September 11, 2001, the Russian Federation has stood with the United States and the rest of the civilized world in the struggle against terrorism and has cooperated in the war in Afghanistan by sharing intelligence and through other means.

(8) United States-Russia relations have improved, leading to a successful summit between President Bush and President Putin in May 2002, resulting in a "Foundation for Cooperation".

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to strengthen and advance institutions of democratic government and of free and independent media, and to sustain the development of an independent civil society in the Russian Federation based on religious and ethnic tolerance, internationally recognized human rights, and an internationally recognized rule of law; and

(2) to focus United States foreign assistance programs on using local expertise and to give local organizations a greater role in designing and implementing such programs, while maintaining appropriate oversight and monitoring.

SEC. 3. UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD THE RUSSIAN FEDERATION.

(a) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of Congress that the United States Government should—

(1) recognize that a democratic and economically stable Russian Federation is inherently less confrontational and destabilizing in its foreign policy and therefore that the promotion of democracy in Russia is in the national security interests of the United States; and

(2) continue and increase assistance to the democratic forces in the Russian Federation, including the independent media, regional administrations, democratic political parties, and nongovernmental organizations.

(b) STATEMENT OF POLICY.—It shall be the policy of the United States—

(1) to facilitate Russia's integration into the Western community of nations, including supporting the establishment of a stable democracy and a market economy within the framework of the rule of law and respect for individual rights, including Russia's membership in the appropriate international institutions;

(2) to engage the Government of the Russian Federation and Russian society in order to strengthen democratic reform and institutions, and to promote transparency and good governance in all aspects of society, including fair and honest business practices, accessible and open legal systems, freedom of religion, and respect for human rights;

(3) to advance a dialogue among United States Government officials, private sector individuals, and representatives of the Government of the Russian Federation regarding Russia's integration into the Western community of nations;

(4) to encourage United States Government officials and private sector individuals to meet regularly with democratic activists, human rights activists, representatives of the independent media, representatives of nongovernmental organizations, civic organizers, church officials, and reform-minded politicians from Moscow and all other regions of the Russian Federation;

(5) to incorporate democratic reforms, the promotion of independent media, and economic reforms in a broader United States dialogue with the Government of the Russian Federation;

(6) to encourage the Government of the Russian Federation to address, in a cooperative and transparent manner consistent with internationally recognized and accepted principles, cross-border issues, including the nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction, environmental degradation, crime, trafficking, and corruption;

(7) to consult with the Government of the Russian Federation and the Russian Parliament on the adoption of economic and social reforms necessary to sustain Russian economic growth and to ensure Russia's transition to a fully functioning market economy and membership in the World Trade Organization;

(8) to persuade the Government of the Russian Federation to honor its commitments made to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) at the November 1999 Istanbul Conference, and to conduct a genuine good neighbor policy toward the other independent states of the former Soviet Union in the spirit of internationally accepted principles of regional cooperation; and

(9) to encourage the G–8 partners and international financial institutions, including the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to develop financial safeguards and transparency practices in lending to the Russian Federation.

SEC. 4. AMENDMENTS TO THE FOREIGN ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1961.

(a) IN GENERAL.—

(1) DEMOCRACY AND RULE OF LAW.—Section 498(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2295(2)) is amended—

(2) INDEPENDENT MEDIA.—Section 498 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2295) is amended—

(A) by redesignating paragraphs (3) through (13) as paragraphs (4) through (14), respectively; and

(B) by inserting after paragraph (2) the following:

"(3) INDEPENDENT MEDIA.—Developing free and independent media, including—

"(A) supporting all forms of independent media reporting, including print, radio, and television;

"(B) providing special support for, and unrestricted public access to, nongovernmental Internet-based sources of information, dissemination and reporting, including providing technical and other support for web radio services, providing computers and other necessary resources for Internet connectivity and training new Internet users in nongovernmental civic organizations on methods and uses of Internet-based media; and

GEORGE W. BUSH.
THE WHITE HOUSE, September 19, 2002.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2001, and under a previous order of the House, the following Member will be recognized for 5 minutes.

CONTINUING CHALLENGES FACING GUAM'S ECONOMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Guam (Mr. UNDERWOOD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as we consider unfinished legislative business for the 107th Congress, I want to take this opportunity to talk about the continuing challenges facing Guam's economy as well as the economies of other insular areas of the United States.

Over the past year, the entire country has faced unprecedented economic challenges in the aftermath of September 11 as well as security challenges, and we have responded here in Congress by the consideration of legislation to establish a Department of Homeland Security and have taken steps to restore the peace in the Middle East and to make our security stronger in the Middle East and around the world.

Against this backdrop, many of the economic relief measures that were passed by Congress did not address the economic conditions of Guam and the other insular areas for a wide number of reasons regarding the exact nature of the relationship.

Fortunately for Guam, legislation was eventually signed into law by President Bush on August 21, the Guam Foreign Investment Equity Act, to provide for equitable rates for foreign investors in Guam and level the playing field.

Most recently, the Committee on Resources on September 12 also marked up H.R. 2826, legislation to provide relief to U.S. Territories by increasing the matching waiver requirements for Federal grants for the territorial governments in Guam, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa and the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas. I hope that the House will be able to act on this measure in the near future.

With regard to actions by the executive branch, I am pleased that President Bush announced the appointment of David Cohen to be Deputy Assistant Secretary for Insular Affairs in late April. This appointment was an elevation from the position formerly entitled Director of the Office of Insular Affairs; and it was greatly appreciated by people in the territories, particularly given Mr. Cohen's qualifications and knowledge of insular issues.

Today I would like to again reiterate my call for the establishment of a Federal interagency group headed by the White House and Department of the Interior to address issues in the U.S. Territories of Guam, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Marianas, and American Samoa; and I am hopeful that President Bush will do so by Presidential executive order.

As a follow-up to my previous concerns on Federal insular affairs, I believe it is equally important to ensure that there is greater coordination amongst Federal agencies on insular area issues. The elevation of the OIA director to the Deputy Assistant Secretary position and the establishment of a Federal interagency group on insular areas are both necessary to improve Federal territorial relations and to have a chance to improve our economies as well.

Unlike the 50 States, any of the 50 States, the insular areas simply do not have the same representation, available resources, or level playing field in Congress or the Federal policy-making process. In addition, our small populations, geographical distance from Washington, D.C., and our varying political and tax structures create even greater challenges and complexities.

While the Interior Department is the lead agency for the territories, many of the pressing matters facing our island communities do not fall under that Department's jurisdiction. Such things as taxes, economic development, health, education, labor, immigration, agriculture, the environment, transportation, housing and defense all fall under other agencies. As a result, the insular area governments, many of which are experiencing budgetary shortfalls and double-digit unemployment rates, have a difficult time having issues addressed by the executive branch in an effective and timely manner.

Previously, under the previous Clinton administration, an Interagency Group on Insular Areas was established by Presidential memorandum in 1999 to provide guidance to Federal agencies on policies concerning the insular areas. Although a forum was held in the year 2000 and an attempt was made to produce a Federal progress report on economic development, there has been no continuation in the dialogue between the insular areas and the interagency group. Consequently, there has been very little coordination of the executive response. During these very difficult economic times, it is more important that there be a forum in which the insular areas can work with all of the Federal agencies in a collaborative matter.

It is important to understand that in a place like Guam we are experiencing double-digit unemployment. In fact, some figures place us as high as 21 percent unemployment. We are suffering from the effects of September 11. We need the administration to establish via Presidential executive order an interagency group to address economic issues, homeland security issues, anything that affects the territories.

COMMUNICATION FROM DISTRICT DIRECTOR OF HON. BRIAN BAIRD, MEMBER OF CONGRESS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, September 10, 2002.

Hon. J. DENNIS HASTERT,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to formally notify you, pursuant to Rule VIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, that I have been served with a deposition subpoena issued by the Superior Court of Washington for Cowlitz County in a civil case pending there.

After consultation with the Office of General Counsel, I have determined that it is consistent with the precedents and privileges of the House to comply with the subpoena.

Sincerely,

JEANNE BENNETT,
District Director.

SEC. 403. LIMITATION ON THE UNITED STATES SHARE OF ASSESSMENTS FOR UNITED NATIONS REGULAR BUDGET.

"None of the funds available to the Department of State shall be used to pay the United States share of assessed contributions for the regular budget of the United Nations in an amount greater than 22 percent of the total of all assessed contributions for that budget.".

SEC. 404. PROMOTION OF SOUND FINANCIAL PRACTICES BY THE UNITED NATIONS.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) In the early 1980s, the United States Government began to pay United States assessments to certain international organizations in the last quarter of the calendar year in which they were due. This practice allowed the United States to pay its annual assessment to the United Nations and other international organizations with the next fiscal year's appropriations, taking advantage of the fact that international organizations operate on calendar years. It also allowed the United States to reduce budgetary outlays, making the United States budget deficit appear smaller.

(2) The United States, which is assessed 22 percent of the United Nations regular budget, now pays its dues at least 10 months late, and often later depending on when the relevant appropriation is enacted.

(3) This practice causes the United Nations to operate throughout much of the year without a significant portion of its operating budget. By midyear, the budget is usually depleted, forcing the United Nations to borrow from its separate peacekeeping budget (the organization is prohibited from external borrowing). As a result, countries that contribute to United Nations peacekeeping missions are not reimbursed on a timely basis.

(4) For years, the United States has been encouraging the United Nations and other international organizations to engage in sound, fiscally responsible budgetary practices. In fact, many of the conditions in United States law for paying nearly $1,000,000,000 in debt to the United Nations and other international organizations are aimed at this goal. But late payment of United States dues forces the United Nations and other international organizations to engage in budgetary practices that are neither sound nor responsible.

(b) Sense of Congress.—It is the sense of Congress that the United States should initiate a process to synchronize the payment of its assessments to the United Nations and other international organizations over a multiyear period so that the United States can resume paying its dues to such international organizations at the beginning of each calendar year.

(c) Authorization of Appropriations.—

(1) In general.—In addition to amounts otherwise available for the purpose of payment of the United States assessed contributions to the United Nations and other international organizations, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the policy described in subsection (b).

(2) Availability of funds.—Amounts appropriated pursuant to paragraph (1) are authorized to remain available until expended.

SEC. 1305. INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY REGULAR BUDGET ASSESSMENTS AND VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The Department has concluded that the International Atomic Energy Agency (in this section referred to as the ''IAEA'') is a critical and effective instrument for verifying compliance with international nuclear nonproliferation agreements, and that it serves as an essential barrier to the spread of nuclear weapons.

(2) The IAEA furthers United States national security objectives by helping to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons material, especially through its work on effective verification and safeguards measures.

(3) The IAEA can also perform a critical role in monitoring and verifying aspects of nuclear weapons reduction agreements between nuclear weapons states.

(4) The IAEA has adopted a multifaceted action plan, to be funded by voluntary contributions, to address the threats posed by radioactive sources that could be used in a radiological weapon and will be the leading international agency in this effort.

(5) As the IAEA has negotiated and developed more effective verification and safeguards measures, it has experienced significant real growth in its mission, especially in the vital area of nuclear safeguards inspections.

(6) Nearly two decades of zero budget growth have affected the ability of the IAEA to carry out its mission and to hire and retain the most qualified inspectors and managers, as evidenced in the decreasing proportion of such personnel who hold doctorate degrees.

(7) Increased voluntary contributions by the United States will be needed if the IAEA is to increase its safeguards activities and also to implement its action plan to address the worldwide risks posed by lost or poorly secured radioactive sources.

(8) Although voluntary contributions by the United States lessen the IAEA's budgetary constraints, they cannot readily be used for the long-term capital investments or permanent staff increases necessary to an effective IAEA safeguards regime.

(9) The recent United States decision to accept a 25 percent IAEA regular budget assessment was based upon a correct interpretation of existing law. It was not the intent of Congress that the United States contributions to all United Nations-related organizations and activities be reduced pursuant to the Admiral James W. Nance and Meg Donovan Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001 (as enacted into law by section 1000(a)(7) of Public Law 106–113; 113 Stat. 1501A–405 et seq.), which sets 22 percent assessment rates as benchmarks for the general United Nations budget, the Food and Agricultural Organization, the World Health Organization, and the International Labor Organization. Rather, contributions for an important and effective agency such as the IAEA should be maintained at levels commensurate with the criticality of its mission.

(10) The Secretary should negotiate a gradual and sustained increase in the regular budget of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which should begin with the 2004 budget.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—Of the funds authorized to be appropriated for Nonproliferation, Anti-terrorism, Demining, and Related Programs there is authorized to be appropriated $60,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for a United States voluntary contribution to the International Atomic Energy Agency, including for the purpose of implementing the Protection Against Nuclear Terrorism program adopted by the International Atomic Energy Agency Board of Governors in March 2002.

SEC. 1311. SHORT TITLE.

This subtitle may be cited as the "Russian Federation Debt for Nonproliferation Act of 2002".

SEC. 1312. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) Findings.—Congress finds the following:

(1) It is in the vital security interests of the United States to prevent the spread of weapons of mass destruction to additional states or to terrorist organizations, and to ensure that other nations' obligations to modify their stockpiles of such arms in accordance with treaties, executive agreements, or political commitments are fulfilled.

(2) In particular, it is in the vital national security interests of the United States to ensure that—

(A) all stocks of nuclear weapons and weapons-usable nuclear material in the Russian Federation are secure and accounted for;

(B) stocks of nuclear weapons and weapons-usable nuclear material that are excess to military needs in the Russian Federation are monitored and reduced;

(C) any chemical or biological weapons, related materials, and facilities in the Russian Federation are destroyed;

(D) the Russian Federation's nuclear weapons complex is reduced to a size appropriate to its post-Cold War missions, and its experts in weapons of mass destruction technologies are shifted to gainful and sustainable civilian employment;

(E) the Russian Federation's export control system blocks any proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the means of delivering such weapons, and materials, equipment, know-how, or technology that would be used to develop, produce, or deliver such weapons; and

(F) these objectives are accomplished with sufficient monitoring and transparency to provide confidence that they have in fact been accomplished and that the funds provided to accomplish these objectives have been spent efficiently and effectively.

(3) United States programs should be designed to accomplish these vital objectives in the Russian Federation as rapidly as possible, and the President should develop and present to Congress a plan for doing so.

(4) Substantial progress has been made in United States-Russian Federation cooperative programs to achieve these objectives, but much more remains to be done to reduce the urgent risks to United States national security posed by the current state of the Russian Federation's weapons of mass destruction stockpiles and complexes.

(5) The threats posed by inadequate management of weapons of mass destruction stockpiles and complexes in the Russian Federation remain urgent. Incidents in years immediately preceding 2001, which have been cited by the Russia Task Force of the Secretary of Energy Advisory Board, include—

(B) an attempt by an employee of the Russian Federation's premier nuclear weapons facility to sell nuclear weapons designs to agents of Iraq and Afghanistan; and

(6) Addressing these threats to United States and world security will ultimately consume billions of dollars, a burden that will have to be shared by the Russian Federation, the United States, and other governments, if these threats are to be neutralized.

(7) The creation of new funding streams could accelerate progress in reducing these threats to United States security and help the government of the Russian Federation to fulfill its responsibility for secure management of its weapons stockpiles and complexes as United States assistance phases out.

(8) The Russian Federation has a significant foreign debt, a substantial proportion of which it inherited from the Soviet Union.

(9) Past debt-for-environment exchanges, in which a portion of a country's foreign debt is canceled in return for certain environmental commitments or payments by that country, suggest that a debt-for-nonproliferation exchange with the Russian Federation could be designed to provide additional funding for nonproliferation and arms reduction initiatives.

(10) Most of the Russian Federation's official bilateral debt is held by United States allies that are advanced industrial democracies. Since the issues described pose threats to United States allies as well, United States leadership that results in a larger contribution from United States allies to cooperative threat reduction activities will be needed.

(11) At the June 2002 meeting of the G–8 countries, agreement was achieved on a G–8 Global Partnership against the Spread of Weapons and Materials of Mass Destruction, under which the advanced industrial democracies committed to contribute $20,000,000,000 to nonproliferation programs in the Russian Federation during a 10-year period, with each contributing country having the option to fund some or all of its contribution through reduction in the Russian Federation's official debt to that country.

(12) The Russian Federation's Soviet-era official debt to the United States is estimated to be $480,000,000 in Lend-Lease debt and $2,250,000,000 in debt as a result of credits extended under title I of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (7 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.).

(b) Purposes.—The purposes of this subtitle are—

(1) to facilitate the accomplishment of the United States objectives described in the findings set forth in subsection (a) by providing for the use of a portion of the Russian Federation's foreign debt to fund nonproliferation programs, thus allowing the use of additional resources for these purposes; and

(2) to help ensure that the resources made available to the Russian Federation are targeted to the accomplishment of the United States objectives described in the findings set forth in subsection (a).

SEC. 1313. DEFINITIONS.

In this subtitle:

(a) Authority To Reduce Debt.—

(1) In general.—Upon the entry into force of a Russian Federation Nonproliferation Investment Agreement, the President may reduce amounts of Soviet-era debt owed by the Russian Federation to the United States (or any agency or instrumentality of the United States) that are outstanding as of the last day of the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year for which appropriations are available for the reduction of debt, in accordance with this subtitle.

(5) Not treated as foreign assistance.—Any reduction of Soviet-era debt pursuant to this subtitle shall not be considered assistance for the purposes of any provision of law limiting assistance to a country.

(c) Authorization of Appropriation.—

(1) In general.—For the cost (as defined in section 502(5) of the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990) of modifying any Soviet-era debt obligation pursuant to subsection (a), there are authorized to be appropriated to the President such sums as may be necessary.

(2) Availability of funds.—Amounts appropriated pursuant to paragraph (1) are authorized to remain available until expended.

SEC. 1315. RUSSIAN FEDERATION NONPROLIFERATION INVESTMENT AGREEMENT.

(a) In General.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The President is authorized to enter into an agreement with the Russian Federation under which an amount equal to the value of the debt reduced pursuant to section 1314 will be used to promote the nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the means of delivering such weapons. An agreement entered into under this section may be referred to as the "Russian Federation Nonproliferation Investment Agreement".

(2) each program or project funded pursuant to the Agreement will be approved by the President;

(3) the administration and oversight of nonproliferation programs and projects will incorporate best practices from established threat reduction and nonproliferation assistance programs;

(4) each program or project funded pursuant to the Agreement will be subject to monitoring and audits conducted by or for the United States Government to confirm that agreed funds are expended on agreed projects and meet agreed targets and benchmarks;

(8) not less than 75 percent of the funds made available for each nonproliferation program or project under the Agreement will be spent in the Russian Federation.

(c) USE OF EXISTING MECHANISMS.—It is the sense of Congress that, to the extent practicable, the boards and administrative mechanisms of existing threat reduction and nonproliferation programs should be used in the administration and oversight of programs and projects under the Agreement.

(d) JOINT AUDITING.—It is the sense of Congress that the United States and the Russian Federation should consider commissioning the United States General Accounting Office and the Russian Chamber of Accounts to conduct joint audits to ensure that the funds saved by the Russian Federation as a result of any debt reduction are used exclusively, efficiently, and effectively to implement agreed programs or projects pursuant to the Agreement.

(e) STRUCTURE OF THE AGREEMENT.—It is the sense of Congress that the Agreement should provide for significant penalties—

(1) if funds obligated for approved programs or projects are determined to have been misappropriated; and

(2) if the President is unable to make the certification required by section 1317(a) for two consecutive years.

SEC. 1316. INDEPENDENT MEDIA AND THE RULE OF LAW.

Notwithstanding section 1315 (a)(1) and (b)(1), up to 10 percent of the amount equal to the value of the debt reduced pursuant to this subtitle may be used to promote a vibrant, independent media sector and the rule of law in the Russian Federation through an endowment to support the establishment of a "Center for an Independent Press and the Rule of Law" in the Russian Federation, which shall be directed by a joint United States-Russian Board of Directors in which the majority of members, including the chairman, shall be United States personnel, and which shall be responsible for management of the endowment, its funds, and the Center's programs.

SEC. 1317. RESTRICTION ON DEBT REDUCTION AUTHORITY.

(a) PROLIFERATION TO STATE SPONSORS OF TERRORISM.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (c), the debt reduction authority provided by section 1314 may not be exercised unless and until the President certifies to the appropriate congressional committees that the Russian Federation has made material progress in stemming the flow of sensitive goods, technologies, material, and know-how related to the design, development, and production of weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them to state sponsors of international terrorism.

(b) ANNUAL DETERMINATION.—If, in any annual report to Congress submitted pursuant to section 1321, the President cannot certify that the Russian Federation continues to meet the condition required in subsection (a), then, subject to the provisions of subsection (c), the debt reduction authority provided by section 1314 may not be exercised unless and until such certification is made to the appropriate congressional committees.

(c) PRESIDENTIAL WAIVER.—The President may waive the requirements of subsection (a) or (b) for a fiscal year if the President—

(1) determines that application of the subsection for a fiscal year would be counter to the national interest of the United States; and

(2) so reports to the appropriate congressional committees.

SEC. 1318. DISCUSSION OF RUSSIAN FEDERATION DEBT REDUCTION FOR NONPROLIFERATION WITH OTHER CREDITOR STATES.

It is the sense of Congress that the President and such other appropriate officials as the President may designate should pursue discussions with other creditor states with the objectives of—

(1) ensuring that other advanced industrial democracies, especially the largest holders of Soviet-era Russian debt, dedicate significant proportions of their bilateral official debt with the Russian Federation or equivalent amounts of direct assistance to the G–8 Global Partnership against the Spread of Weapons and Materials of Mass Destruction, as agreed upon in the Statement by G–8 Leaders on June 27, 2002; and

(2) reaching agreement, as appropriate, to establish a unified Russian Federation official debt reduction fund to manage and provide financial transparency for the resources provided by creditor states through debt reductions.

Subtitle C—Nonproliferation Assistance Coordination

SEC. 1331. SHORT TITLE.

This subtitle may be cited as the "Nonproliferation Assistance Coordination Act of 2002".

SEC. 1332. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that—

(1) United States nonproliferation efforts in the independent states of the former Soviet Union have achieved important results in ensuring that weapons of mass destruction, weapons-usable material and technology, and weapons-related knowledge remain beyond the reach of terrorists and weapons-proliferating states;

(2) although these efforts are in the United States national security interest, the effectiveness of these efforts has suffered from a lack of coordination within and among United States Government agencies;

(3) increased spending and investment by the United States private sector on nonproliferation efforts in the independent states of the former Soviet Union, specifically, spending and investment by the United States private sector in job creation initiatives and proposals for unemployed Russian Federation weapons scientists and technicians, are making an important contribution in ensuring that knowledge related to weapons of mass destruction remains beyond the reach of terrorists and weapons-proliferating states; and

(4) increased spending and investment by the United States private sector on nonproliferation efforts in the independent states of the former Soviet Union make advisable the establishment of a coordinating body to ensure that United States public and private efforts are not in conflict, and to ensure that public spending on efforts by the independent states of the former Soviet Union is maximized to ensure efficiency and further United States national security interests.

SEC. 1333. DEFINITIONS.

(c) REPORT.—Not later than March 1, 2003, the President shall submit to the appropriate congressional committees a report describing United States efforts to achieve the objectives listed in subsections (a) and (b), the progress made toward the achievement of those objectives, and the likelihood that each objective will be achieved by September 30, 2003.

(b) Report Required.—Not later than May 1, 2003, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives setting forth the measures taken under subsection (a).

SEC. 1604. DIPLOMATIC PRESENCE OVERSEAS.

(2) develop a group of highly specialized, technical experts with country expertise capable of administering the nonproliferation and political-military affairs functions of the Department.

(b) Authority.—To carry out the purposes of subsection (a), the Secretary is authorized to establish the position of Counselor for Nonproliferation and Political Military Affairs in United States diplomatic missions overseas, to be filled by individuals who are career Civil Service officers or Foreign Service officers committed to follow-on assignments in the Nonproliferation Bureau or the Political Military Affairs Bureau of the Department.

SEC. 1605. COMPLIANCE WITH THE CHEMICAL WEAPONS CONVENTION.

(a) Findings.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) On April 24, 1997, the Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification of the Chemical Weapons Convention subject to the condition, among others, that the President certify that no sample collected in the United States pursuant to the Convention will be transferred for analysis to any laboratory outside the territory of the United States.

(2) Congress enacted the same condition into law as section 304(f)(1) of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 (22 U.S.C. 6724(f)(1)).

(3) Part II, paragraph 57, of the Verification Annex of the Convention requires that all samples requiring off-site analysis under the Convention shall be analyzed by at least two laboratories that have been designated as capable of conducting such testing by the OPCW.

(4) The only United States laboratory currently designated by the OPCW is the United States Army Edgewood Forensic Science Laboratory.

(5) In order to comply with the Chemical Weapons Convention, the certification submitted pursuant to condition (18) of the resolution of ratification of the Chemical Weapons Convention, and the requirements of section 304(f)(1) of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 (22 U.S.C. 6724(f)(1)), the United States must possess, at a minimum, a second OPCW-designated laboratory.

(6) The possession of a second OPCW-designated laboratory is necessary in view of the potential for a challenge inspection to be initiated against the United States by a foreign nation.

(7) The possession of a third OPCW-designated laboratory would enable the OPCW to implement its normal sample analysis procedures, which randomly assign real and manufactured samples so that no laboratory knows the origin of a given sample.

(8) To qualify as a designated laboratory, a laboratory must be certified under ISO Guide 25 or a higher standard and complete three proficiency tests. The laboratory must have the full capability to handle substances listed on Schedule 1 of the Annex on Schedules of Chemicals of the Chemical Weapons Convention. In order to handle such substances in the United States, a laboratory also must operate under a bailment agreement with the United States Army.

(9) Several existing United States commercial laboratories have approved quality control systems, already possess bailment agreements with the United States Army, and have the capabilities necessary to obtain OPCW designation.

(10) In order to bolster the legitimacy of United States analysis of samples taken on its national territory, it is preferable that one designated laboratory not be a United States Government facility.

(b) Establishment of Non-Governmental Designated Laboratory.—

(1) Report.—Not later than March 1, 2003, the United States National Authority, as designated under section 101 of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 (22 U.S.C. 6711) (referred to in this section as the "National Authority"), shall submit to the appropriate congressional committees a report detailing a plan for securing OPCW designation of a nongovernmental United States laboratory by December 1, 2004.

(2) Directive.—Not later than June 1, 2003, the National Authority shall select, through competitive procedures, a nongovernmental laboratory within the United States to pursue designation by the OPCW.

(3) Delegation.—The National Authority may delegate the authority and administrative responsibility for carrying out paragraph (2) to one or more of the heads of the agencies described in section 101(b)(2) of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 (22 U.S.C. 6711(b)(2)).

(c) Definitions.—In this section:

(1) Chemical weapons convention or convention.—The term "Chemical Weapons Convention" or "Convention" means the Convention on the Prohibition of Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction, Opened for Signature and Signed by the United States at Paris on January 13, 1993, including the following protocols and memorandum of understanding:

(B) The Annex on Implementation and Verification.

(C) The Annex on the Protection of Confidential Information.

(2) Taiwan.—To the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office in the United States (which is the Taiwan instrumentality designated pursuant to section 10(a) of the Taiwan Relations Act), the KIDD class guided missile destroyers KIDD (DDG 993), CALLAGHAN (DDG 994), SCOTT (DDG 995), and CHANDLER (DDG 996).

(3) Turkey.—To the Government of Turkey, the OLIVER HAZARD PERRY class guided missile frigates ESTOCIN (FFG 15) and SAMUEL ELIOT MORISON (FFG 13).

(c) Grants Not Counted in Annual Total of Transferred Excess Defense Articles.—The value of a vessel transferred to another country on a grant basis under section 516 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2321j) pursuant to authority provided by subsection (a) shall not be counted for the purposes of subsection (g) of that section in the aggregate value of excess defense articles transferred to countries under that section in any fiscal year.

(d) Costs of Transfers on Grant Basis.—Any expense incurred by the United States in connection with a transfer authorized by this section shall be charged to the recipient (notwithstanding section 516(e)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2321j(e)(1))) in the case of a transfer authorized to be made on a grant basis under subsection (a).

(e) Waiver Authority.—For a vessel transferred on a grant basis pursuant to authority provided by subsection (a)(2), the President may waive reimbursement of charges for the lease of that vessel under section 61(a) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2796(a)) for a period of one year before the date of the transfer of that vessel.

(f) Repair and Refurbishment in United States Shipyards.—To the maximum extent practicable, the President shall require, as a condition of the transfer of a vessel under this section, that the country to which the vessel is transferred have such repair or refurbishment of the vessel as is needed, before the vessel joins the naval forces of that country, performed at a shipyard located in the United States, including a United States Navy shipyard.

(g) Expiration of Authority.—The authority to transfer a vessel under this section shall expire at the end of the two-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to authorize appropriations for the Department of State for fiscal year 2003, to authorize appropriations under the Arms Export Control Act and the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for security assistance for fiscal year 2003, and for other purposes.".

And the Senate agree to the same.

Sec. 114. International commissions

Authorizes $66,385,000 for fiscal year 2003 for U.S. contributions to the International Boundary and Water Commission, United States and Mexico; the International Boundary Commission, United States and Canada; the International Joint Commission; and the International Fisheries Commission. These funds enable the United States to meet its obligations as a participant in international commissions including those dealing with American boundaries and related matters with Canada and Mexico and international fisheries commissions.

Sec. 115. Migration and Refugee Assistance

Authorizes $820,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for Migration and Refugee Assistance. This section enables the Secretary of State to provide assistance and make contributions for migrants and refugees, including contributions to international organizations such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee for the Red Cross, and through private volunteer agencies, governments, and bilateral assistance, as authorized by law.

This section also includes subauthorizations for Tibetan refugees in India and Nepal, refugees resettling in Israel, and humanitarian assistance for displaced Burmese.

Sec. 116. Grants to the Asia Foundation

Authorizes $15,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for grants to the Asia Foundation.

Mobile library. The Managers take note of the actions taken by the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, Cuba to use a portion of the funds allocated for outreach to independent organizations inside the island and expansion of independent libraries, to establish a mobile library that will ensure broader distribution of approved materials to pro-democracy forces throughout the island.

SUBTITLE B—UNITED STATES INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING ACTIVITIES

Sec. 121(b) continues authorization for broadcasting to the PRC and neighboring countries.

Sec. 121(c) authorizes an additional $20,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for the Middle East Radio Network of Voice of America.

Mobile library. The Managers take note of the actions taken by the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, Cuba to use a portion of the funds allocated for outreach to independent organizations inside the island and expansion of independent libraries, to establish a mobile library that will ensure broader distribution of approved materials to pro-democracy forces throughout the island.

Title II—Department of State Authorities and Activities

Sec. 201. Emergency evacuation services

Under current law, the State Department has authority to use appropriated funds to evacuate private U.S. citizens (and accompanying dependents or guardians), as well as third-country nationals, when their lives are endangered by war, civil unrest, or natural disaster. This section clarifies the Department's authority to retain reimbursements for emergency evacuation services from private U.S. citizens and third-country nationals.

Sec. 202. Special agent authorities

This section makes three changes to the authorities of Diplomatic Security (DS) Agents. First, paragraph (1) gives such agents authority to obtain and execute search and arrest warrants as well as obtain and serve subpoenas and summonses issued under the authority of the United States. Under current law, agents may exercise these authorities only for offenses involving passport and visa cases. This limitation may handicap agents, for example, who are carrying out their protective functions in a situation in which an individual wanted on a federal warrant poses a threat to the protected person. The broader authority provided in this section is similar to authority possessed by numerous law enforcement agents throughout the federal government. Paragraph (2) makes a technical correction to section 37(a) of the State Department Basic Authorities Act to make clear that a Secretary of State named by a "President-elect" is entitled to protection by Diplomatic Security agents. Paragraph (3) gives DS agents the authority to make arrests without warrant for any federal offense committed in their presence, or for any felony cognizable under the law of the United States if the agents have reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed or is committing such felony. Under current law, agents may exercise this authority in limited circumstances. As with paragraph (1), this provision gives DS agents the same authority granted to numerous other federal law enforcement agents.

Subsection (b) provides that the exercise of certain authorities contained in section 37(a) of the State Department Basic Authorities Act shall be subject to an agreement with the Attorney General, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Subsection (c) provides that the authorities in paragraph 2 and 5 of such subsection may not be exercised until the Secretary of State submits the agreement described above to the appropriate committees and publishes a notice in the Federal Register.

Sec. 203. International Litigation Fund

This section allows the State Department to be reimbursed for costs associated with representing American citizens or companies in international claims. The section would allow the Department to deduct and retain 1.5% of payments of at least $100,000 up to $5 million, and 1% of payments above $5 million received by the Department from foreign governments or foreign entities as a result of the Department's pursuit of claims on behalf of U.S. citizens or others. The funds so retained would be placed into the International Litigation Fund, which was established by Congress in 1994 to provide a dependable and flexible source of funds for expenses relating to preparing or prosecuting a proceeding before an international tribunal, or a claim by or against a foreign government or other foreign entity. The Fund has no dedicated source of money; rather, it is dependent on voluntary contributions, transfers from other agencies, or reprogrammings. Similar deductions are taken from Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal awards of the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

Sec. 204. State Department records of overseas deaths of U.S. citizens from unnatural causes

This section requires the Secretary of State to collect certain information regarding the deaths of U.S. citizens when those deaths result from non-natural causes. This information will be maintained in a data base on a country-by-country basis and will be available to the public.

This section is intended to provide specific information to potential travelers about deaths of American citizens overseas when those deaths result from non-natural causes. The current Consular Information Sheets tend to warn of generalized dangers, such as "Several tourists have been killed or injured in jet-ski accidents, particularly when participating in group tours." The information provided must be specific enough to alert the U.S. public to potential dangers to enable the reader to make an informed decision. The Managers intend that this section will be applied in a manner consistent with the Privacy Act. The section requires that the information be gathered to the "maximum extent practicable." This should be read as a rule of reason. Consular officials should gather information from reports presented directly to them, from media reports, and from other sources. They are not required, for the purposes of this section, to engage in exhaustive investigations.

Sec. 205. Foreign relations historical series

This provision makes two amendments to increase reporting to Congress on the implementation of Title IV of the State Department Basic Authorities Act, relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States Historical Series. In 1991, Congress enacted Title IV out of concern for the timeliness and historical accuracy of the series, and mandated that it be a "thorough, accurate and reliable documentary record of major U.S. foreign policy decisions and significant U.S. diplomatic activity." Title IV requires, among other things, that the Secretary ensure that volumes in the series be published not more than 30 years after the events recorded. A decade after the law was enacted, the Department remains out of compliance with this provision. These reporting requirements will facilitate oversight by Congress of implementation of Title IV.

Sec. 206. Expansion of eligibility for award of certain construction contracts

This section would amend eligibility limitations for award of certain contracts for construction, alteration, or repair of State Department buildings and grounds abroad. Currently, bidder qualifications are determined on the basis of nationality of ownership, evidence that the bidder has performed similar construction work in the United States, and other criteria. The amendment would modify the "similar construction work" criterion to include work performed at a U.S. diplomatic or consular establishment abroad, thus enlarging the pool of potentially qualified bidders.

Sec. 207. International Chancery Center

This section amends section 1 of the International Center Act to establish an account in the Treasury into which advances from foreign governments and international organizations may be deposited and whose proceeds may be invested in public debt obligations. Currently, such advances are held in a public bank account.

Sec. 208. Travel to Great Lakes fisheries meetings

This section makes a change to the Great Lakes Fishery Act of 1956 to increase from 5 to 10 the number of government officials permitted to travel to the annual meeting. This section is needed to reflect a change in the meeting structure for the Great Lakes Fisheries Commission (GLFC), which promotes environmental protection and economic development among the Great Lakes member states and Canada. When section 4 of the Great Lakes Fisheries Act of 1956 was originally enacted, the GLFC held two annual meetings per year with five members of the Great Lakes Fisheries Advisory Committee attending each meeting. The GLFC now holds only one annual meeting. This provision will permit the State Department to fund the travel of up to 10 members of the advisory committee to the one annual meeting.

This section makes a technical correction to section 7 of the Fishermen's Protective Act of 1967 (P.L. 83–680), which was enacted to deter foreign governments from seizing U.S. commercial fishing vessels based on claims to a fisheries jurisdiction not recognized by the United States. One of the State Department's primary responsibilities under the Act is to administer funds from which reimbursement could be sought by U.S. vessel owners. Recent amendments erroneously transferred certain responsibilities from the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of Commerce, rather than to the Secretary of State.

Sec. 210. Use of funds received by International Boundary and Water Commission

This provision permits the U.S. Section of the International Boundary and Water Commission to receive reimbursements from the North American Development Bank and the Border Environment Cooperation Committee.

Sec. 211. Fee collections relating to intercountry adoptions and affidavits of support

This section amends Section 403 of the Intercountry Adoption Act of 2000 and Section 232 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001. These amendments permit the expenditure of funds collected by the Department under those statutory provisions.

Sec. 212. Annual reports on compliance with the Hague Convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction

This section makes permanent the reporting requirement enacted in Section 2803(a) of the Foreign Affairs Reform and Restructuring Act of 1998 pertaining to compliance with the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction.

The Managers are alarmed by the State Department's continuing lack of success in serious child abduction cases involving Germany, Sweden and many other countries. Success should be determined by whether the reunion of left-behind parent and abducted child has occurred. Establishment of child abduction commissions, study groups and other bodies are no substitute for reunions.

The State Department's performance in assisting Americans whose children have been wrongfully taken or retained abroad is hampered by the lack of involvement and personal diplomacy by chiefs of mission. It is also hampered by relegation of consular issues to a second tier of importance by Department and embassy Managers. This must change.

The Managers expect that the annual report will address the primary issue as to whether a parent-child reunion occurred as a separate and distinct matter from the issue of whether the case has been resolved. The Managers also expect that the State Department's child abduction report will be made available on the State Department's web page. The report should also be disseminated to all state and local governments, to ensure that child abduction issues are taken into account by these authorities as appropriate.

The Managers considered amending the child abduction reporting requirement in order to address concerns raised regarding previous reports. However, the Managers decided to simply extend the requirement for a report indefinitely, with the expectation that the State Department will respond to the concerns stated above.

Sec. 213. Repeal of provision regarding housing for foreign agricultural attache

This section repeals Section 738 of the Agriculture, Rural Development, Food and Drug Administration, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 2001 (P.L. 106–387) limiting the authority of the State Department to sell overseas property.

Sec. 214. United States policy with respect to Jerusalem as the capital of Israel

This section contains four provisions related to the recognition of Jerusalem as Israel's capital. It urges the President to immediately begin the process of relocating the U.S. Embassy in Israel to Jerusalem. It bars the use of funds for the operation of the U.S. consulate in Jerusalem unless the consulate is under the supervision of the U.S. Ambassador to Israel. It denies funds for the publication of official U.S. government documents listing capital cities unless they identify Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. Finally, it allows U.S. citizens born in Jerusalem to have Israel listed, upon request, as their place of birth on passports.

Sec. 215. Report concerning efforts to promote Israel's diplomatic relations with other countries

This section requires the Secretary of State to submit a report concerning United States efforts to promote Israel's diplomatic relations with other countries. The report is required not later than 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Sec. 216. Continuation of reporting requirements

This section continues reports initially enacted in 1998 relating to Saudi claims, the implementation of the LIBERTAD Act, and deaths of Americans by terrorist activities.

SUBTITLE B—EDUCATIONAL, CULTURAL, AND PUBLIC DIPLOMACY AUTHORITIES

Sec. 221. Fulbright-Hays authorities

This provision amends subsection 112(d) of the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, as amended ("Fulbright-Hays Act"), to clarify that the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs may administer programs authorized by several other Acts to the extent such programs are consistent with the purposes of the Fulbright-Hays Act.

Sec. 222. Extension of requirement for scholarships for Tibetans and Burmese

This section extends the authorization for the exchange and scholarship programs for Tibetan and Burmese exiles (contained in Public Law 104-319) through fiscal year 2003.

Sec. 223. Plan related to public diplomacy activities

This section requires the Secretary of State to submit a plan for integrating public diplomacy policy into overall policy formulation and implementation, for improving coordination and communication between public diplomacy officers and the State Department's regional bureaus, and between public diplomacy officers and the Under Secretary of State for Public Diplomacy. At present, public diplomacy considerations are not always adequately addressed in the formulation and implementation of policy, policy coordination is minimal, and public diplomacy officers lack direct channels of communication to the Assistant Secretaries in the regional bureaus or to the Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy.

Sec. 224. Advisory Committee on Cultural Diplomacy

This section establishes, on a temporary basis, an advisory committee on cultural diplomacy to assist the Undersecretary for Public Diplomacy and the Assistant Secretary for Educational and Cultural Affairs in devising initiatives to expand such programming and increase the use of public-private partnerships to fund such programming. The conference committee believes that expansion of cultural diplomacy—the presentation of creative, visual and performing arts abroad—could have significant benefits to U.S. diplomacy. Unfortunately, direct funding for such programs has declined considerably in recent years. Under Section 105(f) of the Fulbright-Hays Act, the Department has authority to accept funds from the private sector for such activities. The Managers urge the Department and the Advisory Committee to explore ways of increasing private sector support for such programming. The Managers urge the Secretary to consider candidates nominated by organizations such as the National Assembly of State Art Agencies, the Association of Performing Arts Presenters, and Americans for the Arts.

Sec. 225. Allocation of funds for "American Corners" in the Russian Federation

This section authorizes $500,000 for fiscal year 2003 for "American Corners" centers in host libraries in the Russian Federation. A number of such centers already exist. The Managers believe that the inclusion of information about United States history, government, culture and values in Russian libraries and access to computers and the Internet in these centers will enhance U.S. programs of assistance and increase Russian citizens' awareness about the United States.

Sec. 226. Report relating to Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe

This section rewrites and updates a current reporting requirement of the Department of State to the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, a joint Executive-Congressional commission.

Sec. 227. Amendments to the Vietnam Education Foundation Act of 2000

This section makes technical amendments to the Vietnam Education Foundation Act of 2000, including clarification of the duties of the Foundation's Board of Directors and the status and tenure of its members.

Sec. 228. Ethical issues in international health

This section requires the Secretary to fund exchanges to provide opportunities to researchers in developing countries to participate in activities related to ethical issues in human subject research, as described in subsection (c). Subsection (b) requires the Secretary to coordinate such programs that may be conducted by USAID and other federal agencies. The Managers intend that these exchanges will help develop expertise in countries where pharmaceutical companies conduct human and other trials so that the developing country has the ability to evaluate the design of such trials.

Sec. 229. Conforming amendments

This section contains several technical and conforming amendments which were overlooked in recent Foreign Relations Authorization Acts.

SUBTITLE C—CONSULAR AUTHORITIES

231. Report on visa issuance to inadmissable aliens

Under current law, the Department of State reports to Congress periodically about non-immigrant visa applications which are refused because the applicant is ineligible under section 212(a)(3) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, relating to security and other grounds. This section adds a requirement that the Department report twice a year on visas issued pursuant to waivers of ineligibility under Section 212(a)(3), including so-called "silent" waivers. As with the current report under Section 51(a) of the Basic Authorities Act, this report may be submitted in classified form.

Sec. 232. Denial of entry into United States of Chinese and other nationals engaged in coerced organ or bodily tissue transplantation

This section prohibits the issuance of a U.S. visa and the entry into the United States to any person who has been directly involved with the coercive transplantation of human organs or bodily tissue unless there are substantial grounds for believing that this individual has discontinued his or her involvement with, and support for, such practices. The visa denial must be based upon "credible and specific information." The prohibition does not apply to a head of state, head of government, or cabinet-level minister. The provision may be waived by the Secretary of State when it is in the national interest to do so. The Managers are concerned about continued reports of involuntary organ harvesting in nations such as the People's Republic of China. A recent study by the Laogai Research Foundation suggests that a number of Chinese doctors who have received specialized medical training in the United States may have been involved in the practice of harvesting organs from executed prisoners without permission from the potential donors or their families.

Sec. 233. Processing of visa applications

This section states that (1) it shall be the policy of the State Department to process visa applications of immediate relatives and fiances of U.S. citizens within 30 days of receiving all necessary documents; and (2) it should be the policy of the Department to process applications sponsored by someone other than an immediate relative within 60 days.

Sec. 234. Machine readable visas

This section provides a cap on the use of funds collected by the State Department for machine readable visas for fiscal year 2003. Funds exceeding $460 million may only be used subject to reprogramming.

SUBTITLE D—MIGRATION AND REFUGEES

Sec. 241. Prohibition on funding the involuntary return of refugees

Subsection 241(a) makes permanent a provision of current law contained in previous Foreign Relations Authorization Acts prohibiting the use of funds appropriated to the State Department for the involuntary return of refugees to countries in which they have a well-founded fear of persecution, except on grounds recognized as precluding refugee protection under the 1951 Convention and 1967 Protocol. The provision does not prohibit funding for the return of persons who had been found to be non-refugees by a process genuinely calculated to identify and protect refugees.

Subsection 241(b) requires that notice be given to the appropriate congressional committees prior to use of funds appropriated to the State Department for the involuntary return of any person. The subsection provides a limited exception in cases where prior notice is impracticable due to an emergency involving a threat to human life. The notice provision provides an opportunity for congressional oversight to ensure that the prohibition on funding the return of refugees is strictly observed. The managers recognize that activities described in this section may require expedition and that the notice required by this section may therefore be provided in whatever way is most appropriate under the circumstances. The notice required by this section may be written or oral, may be provided whether or not Congress is in session, and in appropriate cases may be provided in classified form. The notice provision does not require the Department to delay any return pending congressional approval or review.

Subsection(c) makes clear that the provisions of this section do not apply to the return of persons pursuant to removal proceedings under the Immigration and Nationality Act or to extradition proceedings, because the law governing these activities provides adequate protections for persons subject to these proceedings, including an opportunity to be heard on any claim that he or she would face persecution upon return.

Subsection (d) defines "effect the involuntary return" as requiring by means of physical force or circumstances amounting to a threat thereof a person to return to a country against his or her will, regardless of whether the person is present in the U.S. and regardless of whether the U.S. acts directly or through an agent. The language "regardless of whether the United States acts directly or through an agent" applies to situations in which the United States contracts with, makes arrangements with, or funds another government or an organization to carry out a project or activity on its behalf. The Managers do not intend it to apply to situations in which the United States contributes funds to another government or an organization as part of a general or special appeal or program and in which United States funds will be commingled with those of other contributors.

This provision applies only to funds appropriated to the Department including the Diplomatic and Consular Programs account and the International Narcotics Control and Law Enforcement account. It does not apply to any funds transferred to the Department from other federal agencies. However, the Managers expect that the Department will notify the appropriate congressional committees as soon as practicable of any case in which the Department uses transferred funds to effect involuntary returns, so that the committees may decide whether further legislation is necessary.

Sec. 242. U.S. membership in the International Organization for Migration

This section provides Congressional approval of certain amendments to the constitution of the International Organization for Migration (IOM). These amendments were adopted in 1998 by the IOM governing body, of which the United States is a member. The proposed amendments to the IOM constitution concern four issues of internal IOM governance.

Sec. 243. Report on overseas refugee processing

This section requires a report on overseas processing of refugees for admission to the United States. In particular, the report should assess the needs of refugees who do not currently have access to U.S. resettlement programs, despite the dramatic decline in U.S. refugee admissions over the last decade. With respect to refugee groups and profiles that should be carefully considered in connection with the preparation of this report, the Managers adopt by reference the explanatory material for section 252 in the House International Relations Committee report (107–57) on H.R. 1646.

Title III—Organization and Personnel of the Department of State

SUBTITLE A—ORGANIZATIONAL MATTERS

Sec. 301. Comprehensive workforce plan

This section requires the State Department to submit to Congress a comprehensive workforce plan within 6 months of the date of enactment. It also requires that the Department develop within 1 year of the date of enactment a domestic staffing model to assist in determining workforce needs in future years. The Managers are concerned that the Department has failed to devote sufficient attention to workforce planning. In particular, the Managers are dismayed at the Department's apparent inability to match staffing requirements to meet the policy needs of overseas posts and stateside offices. This requires dramatically improved coordination between the post mission plans, the regional bureaus policy priorities, and the Bureau of Personnel.

Sec. 302. "Rightsizing" overseas posts

This section requires the Department to establish both an internal and an interagency task force to review issues of overseas staffing presence. This follows through on numerous reports, including that of the Overseas Presence Advisory Panel, that details the need to "right size" overseas posts—i.e., staffing the post to the mission. Reports on the progress of each of these task forces are required.

Sec. 303. Qualifications of certain officers of the Department of State

This section amends Section 1 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 to require the officer with primary responsibility for international narcotics and law enforcement, or that officer's principal deputy, to have substantial professional qualifications in the fields of management and Federal law enforcement or international narcotics policy.

SUBTITLE B—PERSONNEL MATTERS

Sec. 311. Thomas Jefferson Star for Foreign Service

In 1999, Congress created the "Foreign Service Star" to honor U.S. government employees killed or wounded in the line of duty overseas. This provision amends the name of the award to "Thomas Jefferson Star for Foreign Service." The change was requested by the State Department. The award is authorized for all personnel serving at overseas missions.

Sec. 312. Presidential Rank Awards

This provision amends the Foreign Service Act of 1980 in order to restore parity between Senior Foreign Service and Senior Executive Service Presidential Awards. This parity was lost upon enactment of a provision in the FY 1999 Treasury and General Government Appropriations Act which altered the system for awards to senior executives in the civil service, but neglected to make a similar change for Senior Foreign Service Officers.

Sec. 313. Foreign Service National Savings Fund

This section amends Section 408 of the Foreign Service Act to explicitly authorize the Department of the Treasury to hold foreign national retirement funds and accumulated interest. Section 408 provides that the employees hired by the Department and other agencies overseas are compensated based on prevailing wage rates and compensation practices to the extent consistent with public interest. In particular, section 408 explicitly provides the authority for such agencies and their locally engaged staff to make payments to a trust or other fund in a financial institution in order to finance future benefits for such staff. The Department believes that having the Department of Treasury act as a financial institution to hold the funds contributed by the agencies and their locally engaged staff (i.e., the funds contributed based on prevailing practice or the funds voluntarily contributed by the locally engaged staff) would provide a safe and secure means of ensuring the overseas staff's retirement needs are adequately met.

Sec. 314. Clarification of separation for cause

This section revises section 610 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, related to separation from the Service for cause, to make the provision more comprehensible. Several recent amendments to Section 610 have necessitated this change. This section is not intended to make substantive changes to Section 610.

Sec. 315. Dependents on family visitation travel

This section provides Foreign Service families who are separated because of an assignment to an unaccompanied post greater flexibility in arranging authorized family visits. Currently only the Foreign Service Officer may travel to visit family within a certain dollar limitation. This provision would allow for other family members to be authorized to travel in order to meet on authorized family visits at locations other than their home leave addresses.

Sec. 316. Health education and disease prevention programs

This section amends Section 904(b) of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 in order that the Department may better allow its medical professionals to provide counseling and educational materials to foreign national employees of U.S. missions concerning diseases to which they are exposed but that may not be attributable to the workplace. The Office of Medical Services currently provides on-the-job illness and injury services for locally-engaged staff. This provision permits the Department to provide health information and counseling. This is not intended to include any activities contrary to U.S. government policy on family planning.

Sec. 317. Correction of time limitations for grievance filing

This section amends section 1104(a) of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 to correct a drafting error made in the most recent Foreign Relations Authorization Act (P.L. 106–113). This is a technical correction. The literal requirement of the 1999 amendment—that a grievance involving a supervisor be filed "in no case less than two years after the occurrence giving rise to the grievance"—imposes a waiting period, contrary to the intent of Congress.

Sec. 318. Training authorities

This section would make permanent a pilot program authorized in 1998 at the Foreign Service Institute (FSI) which permitted the FSI to provide, on a reimbursable or advance-of-funds basis, appropriate training and related services to employees of U.S. companies which do business abroad, and to family members of such employees, when such training is in the national interest. The pilot program also authorized training, on a reimbursable basis, to Members of Congress or the Judiciary and employees of the legislative and judicial branches. This section requires a report every other year, so Congress can monitor the situation and ensure that such training is not interfering with the primary mission of the FSI.

Sec. 319. Unaccompanied air baggage

This section relates to unaccompanied air baggage of dependent personnel. Under current law, dependent children (of government personnel) on educational travel are allowed to ship up to 250 pounds of baggage between the United States and the employee's post. The law, however, does not cover any storage of effects. Thus, students often spend much of the summer without their baggage because it is in transit either to or from the post. The provision would allow dependent children who attend school in the United States the option of either leaving their belongings in short-term commercial storage in the United States, if there is no additional cost, instead of shipping their baggage to post. Local storage is a common-sense alternative.

Sec. 320. Emergency medical advance payments

In 1999, Congress provided agencies the authority to advance up to three months' pay to an employee assigned or located outside of the United States on government authorization (i.e., on temporary duty), when the employee or family member must undergo certain medical treatments abroad. Such authority is extended to foreign national employees and non-family member United States citizen employees hired abroad when such individuals need medical care while they are located outside their country of employment on U.S. Government authorization.

Sec. 321. Retirement credit for certain government service preformed abroad

Because of changes made in 1986 to federal retirement law, individuals who worked for the Department of State in U.S. missions abroad under part-time, intermittent or temporary ("PIT") appointments after January 1, 1989, were not eligible to pay into a federal retirement system for that service, or receive credit for that service, in order to improve their future retirement situations. The Department of State amended its regulations in 1998 to cover PIT appointees. The amendment created an inequity for PIT appointees who were employed between 1989 and 1998, since that employment time could not be "purchased" or credited toward any federal retirement system. This section is intended to remedy this inequity by permitting individuals with creditable service as PIT appointees between 1989 and 1998 to receive credit and make a deposit into the Federal Employees Retirement System for all or part of that period. It also recognizes the value added by PIT appointees, who are generally the dependents of Foreign Service or U.S. Armed Forces members, to official operations abroad. The Managers believe that this remedy addresses a basic inequity, however unintended, created by various changes to federal retirement law.

Sec. 322. Computation of Foreign Service retirement annuities as if locality pay were made to overseas stationed Foreign Service members

This section addresses a retirement and pay issued identified by the State Department. At present, "locality pay"—which is provided to employees serving in the United States—is included in the calculation of Foreign Service retirement. Foreign Service Officers serving overseas do not receive locality pay. Thus, as they near retirement, they have a significant financial incentive to seek assignment to Washington, D.C. This often deprives overseas posts of the more experienced officers. Under this section, an officer, while serving overseas, will have his or her annuity calculated as if he or she were actually receiving locality pay.

Sec. 323. Plan for improving recruitment of veterans into the Foreign Service

This section requires the Secretary of State to submit a plan to improve the recruitment of veterans to serve as candidates for the Foreign Service. The Managers believe that the United States armed forces provide a largely untapped recruitment pool of qualified individuals with international experience, as well as writing, reporting and analytical skills.

Sec. 324. Report concerning minority employment

This section requires a report on the status of minority recruitment and promotion efforts in the Department of State for both the Civil and Foreign Service. It is similar to a provision adopted in the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1998 and 1999, and adds a requirement for information regarding recruitment and promotion of the Civil Service to the preexisting provision.

Sec. 325. Use of funds authorized for minority recruitment

This section requires the Department to provide additional information on minority recruitment efforts at the Department. Subsection (a) provides that amounts specifically authorized for minority recruitment under section 111 shall be used only for activities directly related to minority recruitment. Salaries of employees involved in recruitment efforts are not to be counted toward that amount. Subsection (b) provides that the State Department must expand its recruitment efforts to 25 percent of Historically Black Colleges and Universities and 25 percent of Hispanic-serving institutions, as defined by law. Subsection (c) requires the Secretary to establish a database relating to efforts to recruit members of minority groups into the Foreign and Civil Service and to report on the evaluation of efforts to recruit such individuals. The Managers are concerned that the Department has not made enough progress in recruiting and promoting members of minority groups to serve in the Foreign and Civil Service. The Managers incorporate by reference the description of the provision in the House passed version of H.R. 1646, section 343, in House Report 107-57.

Sec. 326. Assignments and details of personnel to the American Institute in Taiwan

This section authorizes the detail of U.S. government employees to the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) if the Secretary determines it is in the national interest to do so. Former federal employees who work at AIT have sometimes been disadvantaged by comparison to employees who remain in federal service without a break in service. The grievance rights of separated Foreign Service Officers who work at AIT are far more restricted; former Civil Service employees at AIT cannot apply for "State only" vacancies upon their return; and eligible family members working at AIT cannot earn credit toward retirement. This section corrects that situation.

Sec. 327. Annual reports on foreign language competence

This section changes the date related to a report on foreign language competence. This change converts the report from a calender year to a fiscal year basis and alters the required date of submission of the report.

Sec. 328. Travel of children of members of the Foreign Service assigned abroad

This section amends Section 901 of the Foreign Service Act to provide a child under 21 with the additional flexibility regarding authorized travel when the child is separated from his or her parents.

Title IV—International Organizations

Sec. 401. Payment of the third installment of arrearages

This section amends several conditions that must be certified pursuant to section 941 in the United Nations Reform Act of 1999 to pay the third and last installment of arrearages to the UN and other international organizations under that Act. This section would "de-link" all UN agencies allowing arrearage payments to each international organization upon certification of the conditions established for that particular agency, without linking such payments to the certification of conditions for other organizations. This section would also facilitate certification of other "year three" conditions.

Sec. 402. Limitation on the U.S. share of assessments for UN peacekeeping operations in calendar years 2001 through 2004

This section amends section 404(b)(2) of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, FY94 and FY95, which places a cap of 25 percent on the rate of payment by the U.S. of UN assessments for peacekeeping. This would allow full payment for those assessments in calendar years 2001 through 2004 at the following rates: 28.15 percent for calender year 2001; 27.90 percent for calender year 2002 and; 27.40 for calender year 2003 and 2004. This cap of 25 percent would be restored after 2004.

Sec. 403. Limitation on the U.S. share of assessments for UN regular budget

This provision codifies the 22 percent cap on the U.S. assessment rate for the UN regular budget—as negotiated by the then-UN Ambassador Holbrooke in December of 2000. It is consistent with a condition enacted in the United Nations Reform Act of 1999.

Sec. 404. Promotion of sound financial practices by the UN

This provision notes that the U.S. pays its dues to the UN regular budget at least ten months late every year and that other countries have begun to adopt a similar practice. This late payment of U.S. dues results in the UN engaging in unsound budgetary practices. It states the sense of the Congress that the U.S. should initiate a process to synchronize the payment of its assessment to the UN, its affiliated agencies and other international organizations over a multiyear period so the U.S. can resume paying its dues at the beginning of each calendar year. It authorizes such sums as may be necessary to carry out this policy.

Sec. 405. Reports to Congress on UN activities

This section amends the UN Participation Act by eliminating the requirement to submit quarterly reports on U.S. participation in UN peacekeeping operations. It preserves the requirement for an annual report and consolidates requirements for two annual reports on U.S. financial contributions to international organizations.

Sec. 406. Use of secret ballots within the UN

This section requires a report regarding the use of secret ballots within the UN and its specialized agencies. This report shall also include a determination whether the use of these ballots serves the interests of the U.S.

Sec. 407. Sense of Congress relating to Membership of the U.S. in UNESCO

This section expresses the sense of Congress that the President should, in light of his announcement that the U.S. will rejoin the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, submit a report describing the merits of renewing U.S. membership in this organization and projecting the costs of such membership.

Sec. 408 U.S. membership on the UN Commission on Human Rights and International Narcotics Control Board

This section urges the U.S. to make every reasonable effort at the UN to secure a seat for the U.S. on the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, and for a U.S. national on the UN International Narcotics Control Board and to prevent membership on the Commission by any member state that, in the judgment of the Secretary, consistently violates internationally recognized human rights or has engaged in severe violations of religious freedom in that country.

Sec. 409. Plan for enhanced Department of State efforts to place U.S. nationals in positions of employment in the UN and its specialized agencies

This section calls for the Secretary of State to submit a report containing a plan describing the steps the Department will take to increase American representation in the UN and its specialized agencies.

Title V—U.S. International Broadcasting Activities

Sec. 501. Modification of limitation on grant amounts to RFE/RL, Inc

This section amends a current limit on grants to RFE/RL, Inc., raising it from $75 million per year to $85 million in fiscal year 2003.

Sec. 502. Pay parity for senior executives of RFE/RL, Inc

Under current law, RFE/RL grant funds may not be used to pay any salary or compensation in excess of the rate level IV of the Executive Schedule. The Broadcasting Board of Governors has interpreted this provision as placing a cap on the salaries of senior Managers of RFE/RL at the rate of pay for Executive Level IV, exclusive of locality pay. RFE/RL senior executives are not federal employees and do not receive locality pay under the Federal Employee Pay Comparability Act of 1990 (which provides for locality adjustments in certain high-cost areas). In order to provide pay parity for these senior employees, this provision would permit up to three senior RFE/RL Managers based in Washington to receive a salary benefit equivalent to the comparable Senior Executive Service salary with locality pay.

Sec. 503. Authority to contract for local broadcasting services outside the United States

This section amends current law relating to authority to enter into contracts for certain capabilities. Under current law, the Broadcasting Board of Governors may enter into contracts for periods not to exceed 7 years for circuit capacity to distribute radio and television programs. This section provides authority to enter into contracts for up to 10 years in order to acquire local broadcasting services outside the United States.

Sec. 504. Personal services contracting pilot program

This section provides the International Broadcasting Bureau (IBB) with the authority to implement a pilot program to utilize personal services contracts in the United States. The authority is capped at 60 employees at any one time.

Sec. 505. Travel by Voice of America correspondents

This section exempts Voice of America (VOA) correspondents from the security responsibilities of the Secretary of State under Section 103 of the Diplomatic Security Act and from the Chief of Mission responsibilities in Section 207 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980. Although VOA correspondents are on the federal payroll, they are unique in that they are working journalists. Accordingly, their independent decisions on when and where to cover the news should not be governed by other considerations. The Managers expects that the VOA Director will take appropriate steps to ensure that VOA correspondents do not take undue risks that threaten their personal security.

Sec. 506. Reports on broadcasting personnel

This section requires the Broadcasting Board of Governors to submit a report on its efforts to diversify the workforce at the International Broadcasting Agency.

Sec. 507. Conforming amendments

This section makes technical and conforming amendments to the U.S. International Broadcasting Act to correct technical errors made in previous Foreign Relations Authorization Acts.

Title VI—Miscellaneous Provisions

SUBTITLE A—MIDDLE EAST PEACE COMMITMENTS ACT OF 2002

Sec. 601. Short title

Sec. 602. Findings

This section describes the most basic commitments made by Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in an exchange of letters between the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Chairman Yasser Arafat on September 13, 1993. These commitments include resolving outstanding issues through peaceful means, renouncing terrorism and violence, and assuming responsibility over all PLO personnel.

Sec. 603. Reports

This section requires the President to make a determination and to report every six months (initially 60 days after enactment of the legislation) on whether the PLO and/or the Palestinian Authority (PA) are abiding by their commitments as specified in Section 602.

Sec. 604. Imposition of sanctions

This section provides that, if it is determined (in the Section 603 report) that the PLO and/or the PA are not in compliance with the commitments specified in Section 602, then the President is required to impose at least one of four sanctions for a period of at least six months. The possible sanctions are: deny U.S. visas to PLO and PA officials, downgrade the status of the PLO office in Washington to an information office as existed before the Oslo accords, designate the PLO or its constituent groups as terrorist organizations, and cut off non-humanitarian U.S. assistance to the West Bank and Gaza. The President is allowed to waive the sanctions requirement upon making a determination that such a waiver is in the national security interest of the United States.

SUBTITLE B—TIBET POLICY

This subtitle lays out a comprehensive approach for American policy toward Tibet. The Committee believes that this statement of policy is warranted due to the failure of the Government of the People's Republic of China to preserve the distinct ethnic, cultural and religious identity of the Tibetan people and to enter into a dialog with the Dalai Lama or his representatives to reach a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

Sec. 611. Short title

Sec. 612. Statement of purpose

This section states the purpose of this subtitle: to support the aspirations of the Tibetan people to safeguard their distinct identity.

Sec. 613. Tibet negotiations

This section urges the President and Secretary of State to encourage the Government of the People's Republic of China to enter into a dialogue with the Dalai Lama or his representatives leading to a negotiated agreement on Tibet, and to provide an annual report to the Congress on steps taken to encourage this dialogue and the status of discussions between the Government of China and the Dalai Lama. The Managers note that the Dalai Lama's special representative held talks with Chinese officials in Beijing and in Lhasa, Tibet, in September 2002, and hope that these talks will lead to a meaningful dialogue.

Sec. 614. Reporting on Tibet

This section mandates that a separate section on Tibet be included in the annual human rights report and the annual religious freedom report submitted by the Department of State to the Congress.

Sec. 615. Congressional Executive Commission on the People's Republic of China

This section amends the U.S.-China Relations Act of 2000 to include as issues to be considered by the Congressional-Executive Commission on the People's Republic of China (1) a description of the status of negotiations between the Government of the PRC and the Dalai Lama; and (2) measures taken to safeguard Tibet's distinct identity.

Sec. 616. Economic development on the Tibetan plateau

Subsection (a) of this section states that it is the policy of the United States to support economic development, cultural preservation, health care, and education and environmental sustainability for Tibetans inside Tibet. The Managers note that in 1980 Chinese Party Secretary Hu Yaobang formulated the Six Point Program for Tibet, which stated that the "Tibetan people's habits, customs, history and culture must be respected," that "all ideas that ignore and weaken Tibetan culture are wrong," and that "Tibet should lay down laws, rules and regulations according to its special characteristics to protect the right of national autonomy and its special national interests." Recognizing that the Dalai Lama is not seeking independence for Tibet, that in 1979 Deng Xiaoping offered to negotiate on all issues other than independence, and that President Jiang Zemin has stated that the door to negotiations is open if the Dalai Lama accepts that Tibet is an inseparable part of China, the Conference believes that the adoption by the current Chinese government of the principles formulated by Hu Yaobang would improve the potential for meaningful negotiations with the Dalai Lama and have a positive impact on United States-China relations. Subsection (b) mandates that the United States use its voice and vote in international financial institutions to support projects in Tibet designed in accordance with a set of principles, enumerated in subsection (d), that are designed to raise the standard of living for the Tibetan people and to make them self-sufficient. Subsection (c) states that Export-Import Bank and the Trade and Development Agency should support projects following these principles. Subsection (d) enumerates the principles which are to serve as guidelines for the projects that international financial institutions, non-governmental organizations and the U.S. government should support in Tibet.

Sec. 617. Release of prisoners and access to prisons

This section states that the President and Secretary of State should request the Government of the PRC to immediately release all Tibetan political prisoners including those known to be seriously ill and seek access for international humanitarian organizations to Tibetan prisoners.

Sec. 618. Establishment of a U.S. branch office in Lhasa, Tibet

This section urges the Secretary of State to make best efforts to establish an office in Lhasa, Tibet, to monitor developments in Tibet.

Sec. 619. Requirement for Tibetan language training

This section mandates that Tibetan language training be available to Foreign Service Officers and to make every effort to assign a Tibetan-speaking officer to the U.S. consulate in the PRC that monitors developments in Tibet.

Sec. 620. Religious persecution in Tibet

This section states that the U.S. Ambassador to China should seek to meet with the 11th Panchen Lama and request his release by the Government of the PRC.

Sec. 621. United States Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues

This section mandates the establishment within the Department of State of a United States Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues and outlines the central objective and duties of the Special Coordinator.

SUBTITLE C—EAST TIMOR TRANSITION TO INDEPENDENCE ACT OF 2002

This subtitle specifies steps to be taken by the U.S. government to facilitate the transition of East Timor to independence. The Managers believe that it is in the interests of the United States to help the people of East Timor, who voted overwhelmingly for independence from Indonesia in August 1999, to realize their aspirations for a stable, prosperous democratic nation.

Sec. 631. Short title

Sec. 632. Bilateral assistance

This section authorizes $25 million for fiscal year 2003 for programs in East Timor.

Sec. 633. Multilateral assistance

This section mandates that the United States use its voice, vote and influence at each of the international financial institutions of which it is a member to support economic and democratic development in East Timor.

Sec. 634. Trade and investment assistance

Subsection (a) of this section urges the President of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) to initiate negotiations with the Government of East Timor to enter into a new agreement authorizing OPIC to carry out programs with respect to East Timor. Subsection (b) authorizes $1 million to the Trade and Development Agency to carry out programs in East Timor. Subsection (c) encourages the U.S. Export-Import Bank to expand its activities with respect to East Timor.

Sec. 635. Generalized System of Preferences

This section urges the U.S. Trade Representative and the Customs Commissioner to send an assessment team to East Timor to determine what products from East Timor would be eligible for benefits under the Generalized System of Preferences.

Sec. 636. Authority for radio broadcasting

This section provides that the Broadcasting Board of Governors should broadcast to East Timor in an appropriate language or languages.

Sec. 637. Security assistance for East Timor

Subsection (a) of this section requires the President to conduct a study and report to the appropriate Congressional committees on the extent to which East Timor's security needs can be met through provision of excess defense articles and on the extent to which international military education and training (IMET) assistance will enhance the professionalism of the armed forces of East Timor. Subsection (b) authorizes the provision of excess defense articles and IMET pending a certification that East Timor has established independent armed forces and that assisting those forces will promote U.S. national interests and human rights and professionalization of the armed services in East Timor.

Sec. 638. Reporting requirement

This section requires the Secretary of State to transmit a report within 180 days of enactment, and annually thereafter for five years, on various developments with respect to East Timor including the specific steps taken by U.S. agencies to assist East Timor.

SUBTITLE D—CLEAN WATER FOR THE AMERICAS PARTNERSHIP OF 2002

Sec. 641. Short title

This section entitles the subtitle as the "Clean Water for the Americas Partnership Act of 2002."

Sec. 642. Definitions

Sec. 643. Establishment of program

Sec. 644. Environmental assessment

This section authorizes the President to conduct a comprehensive environmental assessment in the region to determine the most severe environmental problems threatening human health, which countries have them, and whether there is a market for the U.S. environmental industry in the region.

Sec. 645. Establishment of American technology centers

This section authorizes the President to establish Technology America Centers (TEAMs) in the region to link the U.S. environmental technology industry with local partners by providing logistic and information support to U.S. firms seeking opportunities for environmental projects.

Sec. 646. Promotion of water quality, water treatment systems, and energy efficiency

This section authorizes the President to provide matching grants to U.S. associations and non-profits for the purpose of promoting water quality, water treatment and energy efficiency in the region. These grants shall be used to support professional exchanges, academic fellowships, training programs, development of local chapters of associations or non-profits, and online exchanges.

Sec. 647. Grants for feasibility studies within a designated subregion

This section authorizes 75/25 matching grants, through the Trade and Development Agency, for "pre-feasibility studies" for water projects within a subregion or an individual country of the Latin America/Caribbean region. These grants would provide potential investors in environmental projects, primarily water projects such as water treatment plants, a "jump-start" in getting these projects off the ground.

Sec. 648. Clean Water Technical Support Committee

This section authorizes the President to establish a Clean Water Technical Support Committee to provide technical support for water projects in the region.

Sec. 649. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes $10 million for each of the fiscal years 2003 through 2005.

Sec. 650. Report

This section mandates a report to within two years of establishment of the program under Sec. 643 containing an assessment of the progress made in this program and any recommendations for legislative changes.

Sec. 651. Termination date

This section terminates the authorities provided by this subtitle three years after the establishment of the program, unless the President certifies that it would be in the national interest to maintain the program for an additional two-year period.

Sec. 652. Effective date

This section sets the effective date of this subtitle as 90 days after the date of enactment.

SUBTITLE E—FREEDOM INVESTMENT ACT OF 2002

Section 661. Short Title

Sec. 662. Purposes

This section states that the purposes of this subtitle are to: underscore that promoting and protecting human rights is in the national interest of the United States; is consistent with American values and beliefs; and to establish a goal of devoting one percent of the State Department's operating budget to enhancing the ability of the United States to promote respect for human rights and the protection of human rights defenders.

Sec. 663. Human rights activities at the Department of State

This section expresses the sense of Congress that the budget for the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor (DRL) should be substantially increased so that beginning in fiscal year 2005, one percent of the State Department's operating budget should be available for such bureau. It also expresses the sense of Congress that any assignment of an individual to a political officer position at a United States Mission abroad that has the primary responsibility for monitoring human rights developments in a foreign country should be made upon the recommendation of the Assistant Secretary for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor in conjunction with the head of the Department's regional bureau having primary responsibility for that country. This section also requires the Secretary to submit a plan for the Department to (1) improve integration of human rights policy into the Department's overall policy formulation and implementation, (2) achieve closer communication and policy coordination between DRL and the regional bureau, including between DRL and personnel at overseas posts, and (3) to assign persons in the manner described above.

With respect to funding, the Managers intend that the Department take seriously the goals established by this section. For the last few years the Department has been pressed to substantially increase the resources devoted to human rights in general and the DRL bureau in particular. The Managers believe this trend must continue so as to meet the goal defined above.

The Managers also believe that the Department needs to ensure that human rights concerns are considered at every level of decision making within the Department, from the country desk to the Secretary of State. While there has been some movement towards achieving this goal since the mid-1990's, the Managers intend that the Department think creatively in finding new ways to ensure that human rights is an integral component of U.S. foreign policy. In particular, the Managers believe that there needs to be more communication between DRL and the regional bureaus, which often have day-today operational responsibilities with respect to human rights matters, and most importantly, more direct communication between DRL and officers in the field. At a minimum the DRL Bureau needs to concur in any recommendation to assign a person to the particular position overseas. By giving such a role to the DRL Bureau, the Managers believe that Foreign Service Officers will be more likely to seek positions in DRL, since the Bureau will be able to further their career development. The Managers expect that in countries that have significant human rights problems, DRL would have a role in the assignment of senior positions responsible for such issues.

Section 664. Human Rights and Democracy Fund

This section authorizes $21,500,000 for the Human Rights and Democracy Fund from funds appropriated under the "Economic Support Fund" account. The Managers expect that this fund shall continue to be administered by the DRL bureau, as is the case today. The provision also contains a specific authorization for the Documentation Center of Cambodia and a Father John Kaiser Memorial Fund.

Section 665. Reports on actions taken by the United States to encourage respect for human rights

Subsection (a) of this section amends sections 116 and 502B of the Foreign Assistance Act to require that the report mandated by such sections include additional information with respect to each country for which the report indicates that extra-judicial killings, torture, or other serious violations of human rights have occurred. For each such country, the Department is required to report the extent to which the United States has taken or will take action to encourage an end to such practices. Subsection (b) of this section provides that reports on such matters may be submitted in a separate report.

The Mangers intend that the reporting required by the amendments in this section be a serious and substantial report outlining a specifically tailored strategy for each country where there is substantial evidence indicating that the human rights abuses described in the section have occurred.

SUBTITLE F—ELIMINATION AND STREAMLINING OF REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

Sec. 671. Elimination of certain reporting requirements

This section eliminates several reporting requirements.

Sec. 672. Biennial reports on programs to encourage good governance

This section changes the annual report required to a biennial report.

SUBTITLE G—OTHER MATTERS

This section makes revisions to the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998 related to the Commission on International Religious Freedom created by the Act.

Subsection (a) amends the reporting requirement in the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998 to include information on discrimination against particular religious groups or members of such groups. In particular, the Managers are concerned about the use of "sect filters" as a violation of religious freedom as indicated in senate report 107-60, page 33.

Subsection (b) provides for staggered terms for Commission members.

Subsection (c) alters the date of the election of the Chair of the Commission.

Subsection (d) relates to vacancies.

Subsection (e) authorizes $3,000,000 in fiscal year 2003.

Subsection (f) provides limited authority to procure non-governmental services.

Subsection (g) extends the Commission to 2011.

Sec. 682. Amendments to the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000

This section amends the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (Title I of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000) to make clear that programs of assistance to foreign victims shall include, to the maximum extent practical, support to non-governmental organizations in foreign countries that provide protection and assistance to trafficking victims; for education and training of trafficking victims; for safe and voluntary integration or reintegration, as appropriate, of victims into families and/or communities; and for programs that assist families in locating their family members who are trafficking victims and in helping them to return to their homes, to integrate into the communities in which they are living, or to resettle in safe third countries, according to the wishes of the victim. This section also authorizes funding for fiscal year 2003 for programs and activities under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

Sec. 683. Annual Human Rights Country Reports on Child Soldiers

This section amends sections 116(d) and 502B of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to require that the State Department's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices includes information related to each country's compliance with the standards set forth in the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflict.

Sec. 684. Extension of authority for Caucus on International Narcotics Control

This section extends the authorization of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control through September 30, 2005.

Sec. 685. Participation of South Asia countries in international law enforcement

This section provides that the Secretary of State shall ensure, where practicable, that appropriate government officials from countries in the South Asia region shall be eligible to attend courses at the International Law Enforcement Academies located in Bangkok, Thailand, and Budapest, Hungary, consistent with other provisions of law, with the goal of enhancing regional cooperation in the fight against transnational crime.

Sec. 686. Payment of anti-terrorism judgments

This section modifies section 2002 of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, which facilitates collection of damage awards imposed by certain judgments of United States courts against state sponsors of terrorism by amending (a)(2)(A)(ii) of that section to make additions to the persons covered by that section.

Sec. 687. Reports on participation by small businesses in procurement contracts of USAID

Concerns have been expressed regarding the amount of procurement by USAID from small business and small businesses owned and controlled by women and socially and economically disadvantaged individuals, among others. This section is intended to obtain additional information beyond the information that USAID has filed with the Small Business Administration regarding these matters.

Sec. 688. Program to improve building construction and practices in Latin American countries

To limit the economic and social cost of future natural disasters in the region, this section authorizes the President to carry out a program to improve building codes and practices in Latin America by: training appropriate professionals from the region in building codes, practices, and standards; translating American building and life safety codes into Spanish: and providing other relevant assistance as needed, including helping local government officials develop seismic micro-zonation maps.

While El Salvador and Ecuador are initial candidates for the activities authorized in this section, the Managers encourage the Administration to extend this program to other Latin American countries, as needed. The Managers also expect that the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development will consider implementing the program through organizations which are not-for-profits standards development organizations, as defined in OMB Circular A119, to the maximum extent practicable, and possess the relevant experience with the Spanish language.

This section expresses the sense of Congress that the President should direct the Secretary of State and the U.S. Representative to the U.N. to urge the UN to adopt an HIV/AIDS mitigation strategy as a component of UN peacekeeping operations. The Managers acknowledge the dangers associated with the use of peacekeeping forces that contain personnel infected with HIV/AIDS, especially when peacekeeping forces are usually deployed to areas already suffering from the disruption of social, economic, and civil order. This section urges the President to focus special diplomatic emphasis on the establishment of an HIV/AIDS mitigation strategy to be a component of standard UN peacekeeping procedures in order to minimize and, if possible eliminate, these additional dangers. The Managers believe that such a strategy could include specialized training for local officials in particularly hard-hit regions, such as East and Southern Africa, by USAID and similar organizations.

Sec. 690. Sense of Congress relating to Magen David Adom Society

This section recognizes that the Magen David Adom Society is the national humanitarian society in the State of Israel and that it follows all the principles of the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement. Since 1949 the Magen David Adom Society has been refused admission into the International Red Cross and Red Crescent

Movement and has been relegated to observer status without a vote because it has used the Red Shield of David as its symbol. The section states that it is the sense of Congress that (1) the International Committee of the Red Cross should immediately recognize the Magen David Adom Society; (2) the Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies should grant full membership to the Magen David Adom Society immediately following recognition by the International Committee of the Red Cross of the Magen David Adom Society as a full member; (3) the Red Shield of David should be accorded the same protections under international law as the Red Cross and the Red Crescent; and (4) the United States should continue to press for full membership for the Magen David Adom Society in the International Red Cross Movement.

This section expresses the sense of Congress that the Secretary of State should give favorable consideration to requests by the Director of the Peace Corps to allow the Peace Corps to maintain offices in locations separate from the United States embassy to the degree consistent with security considerations.

Sec. 692. Sense of Congress relating to resolution of Taiwan Strait issue

This section expresses the sense of Congress that Taiwan is a democracy and it is the policy of the U.S. that a resolution of the Taiwan Strait issue must be peaceful and include the assent of the people of Taiwan.

Sec. 693. Sense of Congress relating to display of the American flag at the American Institute in Taiwan

This section expresses the sense of the Congress that the American Institute in Taiwan and the residence of the director of the American Institute in Taiwan should publicly display the flag of the United States in the same as manner as it is displayed at United States embassies, consulates, and official residences throughout the world.

Sec. 694. Reports on activities in Colombia

This section requires the Secretary of State to submit two separate reports to Congress on U.S.-funded activities in Colombia. The first report will summarize U.S. efforts to promote alternative development, recovery and resettlement of internally displaced persons, judicial reform, the peace process, and human rights. The report also will establish timetables for these activities, justify delays in meeting previous timetables, and identify corrective measures to prevent future delays.

The second report relates to the activities of U.S. businesses that have entered into agreements with the Departments of State and Defense to administer counter-narcotics programs in Colombia. Given the crucial role of U.S. businesses in carrying out the counter-narcotics objectives of Plan Colombia and its successor programs, the Managers hope that this report will encourage the Administration to be more forthcoming as to the specifics of its partnership with U.S. businesses in Plan Colombia-related activities and the Administration's plans to transfer operational control of same to the appropriate Colombian authorities.

Sec. 695. Report on United States-sponsored activities in Colombia

This section requires the Secretary of State to provide the Congress with a report outlining a comprehensive strategy to eradicate all opium cultivation in Colombia and the impact of Plan Colombia on neighboring countries.

Sec. 696. Report on extradition policy and practice

This section requires a report on extradition practices. The Managers attache great importance to international law enforcement assistance, in particular as the war on terrorism proceeds. The Managers take note of important steps forward achieved recently by the Departments of State and Justice in the field of extradition. In particular, the Managers are aware that these Departments have concluded extradition agreements with several South American countries that require the extradition of nationals. This substantial achievement represents a major departure from the normal practice of civil law countries. These agreements eliminate a major bilateral law enforcement irritant where they are in force, and the Managers hope that this practice will be emulated by treaty partners in Europe and elsewhere.

Sec. 697. Special Court for Sierra Leone.

This section authorizes appropriations of $5 million in fiscal year 2003 to support the Special Court for Sierra Leone. This section also authorizes rewards for information that leads to the arrest of persons indicted by the Special Court.

Sec. 698. United States Envoy for Peace in Sudan

This section states that there should continue to be a United States Envoy for Peace in Sudan until there is a comprehensive settlement to the conflict in Sudan.

Sec. 699. Transfer of proscribed weapons to persons or entities in the West Bank and Gaza

This section authorizes certain sanctions against foreign persons or entities which knowingly transfer certain weapons to Palestinian entities in the West Bank or Gaza.

Sec. 700. Sense of Congress relating to arsenic contamination in drinking water in Bangladesh

This section expresses the sense of Congress that the Secretary of State should work with appropriate United States Government agencies, national laboratories, universities in the United States, the Government of Bangladesh, international financial institutions and organizations, and international donors to identify a long-term solution to the arsenic-contaminated drinking water problem in Bangladesh. It also requests a report on proposals to bring arsenic-free drinking water and to facilitate treatment for those who have already been affected by arsenic-contaminated drinking water in Bangladesh.

Sec. 701. Policing reform and human rights in Northern Ireland

This section reiterates the commitment of the Congress to promote respect for human rights by all parties in Northern Ireland. It calls for independent judicial public inquiries into the killings of defense lawyers Rosemary Nelson and Patrick Finucane and for the government of the United Kingdom to take appropriate measures to protect defense lawyers and human rights defenders, as well as for the decommissioning of weapons by the Irish Republican Army all other paramilitary groups and an end to punishment attacks and exiling by such groups. The section also requires the President to submit a report on the extent to which the governments of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland have implemented the recommendations of the Patten Commission with respect to policing reform, on the status of investigations into the deaths of Rosemary Nelson, Patrick Finucane, and Robert Hammill, and on the status of decommissioning of weapons by the Irish Republican Army and other paramilitary organizations. Finally, the section sets forth conditions on training or exchanges conducted by United States law enforcement agencies for the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) or its members to ensure that such programs promote the peace process and the professionalism of policing and does not include PSNI members who there are substantial grounds for believing have committed or condoned human rights violations.

Sec. 702. Annual report on United States-Vietnam human rights dialogue meetings

This section requires an annual report on the issues discussed at meetings of the United States-Vietnam human rights dialogues, and to what extent the Vietnamese government has made progress on certain human rights issues, including the following: improving commercial and criminal codes, releasing those imprisoned or detained on political or religious grounds, ending official restrictions on religious activity, promoting freedom of the press, improving prison conditions, respecting the rights of indigenous minority groups and of workers, and cooperating with U.S. requests to obtain access to those seeking to come to the United States as refugees or emigrants. The Managers believe that the bilateral dialogue can be an effective means of bringing about improvements in Vietnam's human rights policies if U.S. officials make concerted efforts to place specific issues and cases on the table and encourage the government of Vietnam to respond with concrete steps.

Sec. 703. Sense of Congress regarding human rights violations in Indonesia

This section expresses a sense of Congress that the Government of Indonesia should demonstrate progress toward ending human rights violations by the armed forces and make efforts to find and prosecute those responsible for the murders of Papuan leader Theys Eluay and Acehnese human rights advocate Jafar Siddiq Hamzah, and U.S. citizens Edwin L. Burgon and Ricky L. Spier.

Sec. 704. Report concerning the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility, and the Future"

This section directs the Secretary of State to report on the status of the agreement between the government of the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany concerning the Foundation that was established to distribute Holocaust era insurance claims and payments to Holocaust survivors who were forced into labor or slave labor. This report shall be submitted to appropriate congressional committees, either in writing or orally, within 180 days after the enactment of this Act, and every 180 days thereafter.

Sec. 705. Sense of Congress on return of portraits of Holocaust victims to the artist Dina Babbitt

This section expresses the sense of the Congress that the President and Secretary of State should make all efforts necessary to retrieve the original seven watercolor portraits painted by Dina Babbitt that are held by the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum.

Sec. 706. International drug control certification procedures

This section provides an alternative mechanism to Section 490 of Chapter 8 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to annual drug certification procedures). That mechanism requires the submission of a report to Congress by September 15 of the previous fiscal year setting forth the names of countries determined by the President to be major drug-transit or major illicit drug producers as defined in section 481(e) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. In such reports the President must identify which, if any countries, included in the report have "demonstrably failed" to adhere to obligations under international counter narcotics agreements or have failed to take the counter narcotics measures set forth in section 489(a)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and give a rationale for such determinations.

The section also prohibits any country so identified from receiving U.S. assistance in the subsequent fiscal year unless the President determines that the continuation of assistance is vital to U.S. national interests, or after the initial determination on September 15 of the previous fiscal year, the President subsequently determines that such country is in fact adhering to its international obligations with respect to counter narcotics matters. Once the requirements of this section are fulfilled, funds that would be otherwise withheld pursuant to section 490 are available for obligation or expenditure on or after October 1 of the next fiscal year. If a report is filed pursuant to this section, section 490 (a) through (h) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 will no longer apply in the new fiscal year for countries otherwise covered by that section which have been included in the report required under paragraph (1).

The section also contains a transition rule for fiscal year 2003 setting the date for the transmission of the report required under paragraph 1 of this section at not less than 15 days prior to the obligation or expenditure of any funds that would otherwise be withheld pursuant to Section 490 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. Section 490 (a) through (h) would not apply in FY 2003 for any country included in this report.

Notwithstanding the above, this section would also allow the President to apply Section 490 (a)–(h) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to any country determined to be a major drug transit or illicit drug producing country as defined in section 481(e) of that Act, at his discretion. The Managers believe that under either alternative, if a major drug producer or major transit country fails to qualify for assistance, and the President does not determine that the provision of assistance is nonetheless vital to U.S. national interests, then the President must also direct that United States Executive Directors to each multilateral bank to vote against loans or other utilization of funds to such country from such institutions as described in Sec. 490(a)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

The Managers believe that the addition of this alternative approach gives the President more flexibility to implement a successful U.S. counter-narcotics policy.

DIVISION B—SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 2002

Title X—General Provisions

Sec. 1001. Short Title

This section designates the short title of Division B.

Sec. 1002. Definitions

This section provides definitions for purposes of Division B.

Title XI—Verification of Arms Control and Nonproliferation Agreement

Sec. 1101. Verification and Compliance Bureau personnel

This section authorizes $14,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for the Bureau of Verification and Compliance. In addition, this section authorizes an additional $1,800,000 in fiscal year 2003 for the purpose of hiring new personnel to carry out the Bureau's responsibilities including the assignment of one full-time person in the Bureau to manage the document control, tracking, and printing requirements of the Bureau's operation in a Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility (SCIF).

The Bureau of Verification and Compliance in the Department of State has been unable, with its current personnel and its wide responsibilities (which include some services of common concern for other bureaus), to fully support compliance analysis and enforcement, as well as U.S. negotiations in which verification is an important issue. The Managers therefore authorize a larger budget than requested for this Bureau, including $1.8 million for additional personnel, which should remedy the problem.

The Managers applaud the Department of State for the improvement in the content of its congressionally-mandated nonproliferation reports; further improvement, however, is still needed. For example, the Managers expect the Verification and Compliance Bureau to address countries' compliance with their legal and political nonproliferation commitments, consistent with that Bureau's original statutory mandate. The intent of section 2(a)(1)(B) of the Iran Nonproliferation Act of 2000 (P.L. 106–178) was to cover items that would contribute to the nuclear, chemical, and biological weapons capabilities, and the ballistic missile capabilities, of Iran. The reference in that Act to the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) Annexes was not meant to imply that the report under that Act should cover only the transfer of components meeting every Annex criterion. Rather, items of the general type listed in the Annexes, which could also be used in MTCR-class missiles, should also be covered, consistent with section 2(a)(2) of the Act.

Sec. 1102. Key Verification Assets Fund

This section authorizes $7,000,000 in fiscal year 2003 for the purposes of funding the Key Verification Assets Fund.

The Key Verification Assets Fund has had limited funding since it was created pursuant to section 1111 of the Arms Control and Nonproliferation Act of 1999, but has demonstrated an ability to leverage the work of other departments and agencies in technical aspects of arms control verification. Too often, Department of State funds are required to keep other departments' or agencies' verification assets functioning. While this is a valid and vital use of the Key Verification Assets Fund, the Managers hope that much of the increased funding authorized in this section can be used to promote improved verification, rather than merely to prevent significant degradation of U.S. verification capabilities.

Sec. 1103. Revised verification and compliance reporting requirements

This section modifies the date by which a report on arms control, nonproliferation and disarmament, and compliance is due. Under current law, the report is due on January 31st of each year. This objective has rarely been achieved, if ever. The Managers expect the deadline of April 15th set by this section to be a more realistic date and urge the executive branch to honor this revised requirement.

Title XII—Military and Related Assistance

SUBTITLE A—FOREIGN MILITARY SALES AND FINANCING AUTHORITIES

Sec. 1201. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes $4,107,200,000 for fiscal year 2003 for Foreign Military Financing (FMF), which is the executive branch's requested amount.

Sec. 1202. Relationship of foreign military sales to the U.S. nonproliferation interests

This section amends section 4 of the Arms Export Control Act (AECA) to expand the purposes for which foreign military sales may be provided. This section also amends the AECA to provide a statutory definition of the term, "weapons of mass destruction."

Section 4 of the Arms Export Control Act permits U.S. arms sales or leases "solely for internal security, for legitimate self-defense, to permit the recipient country to participate in regional or collective arrangements or measures consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, or otherwise to permit the recipient country to participate in collective measures requested by the United Nations for the purpose of maintaining or restoring international peace and security, or for the purpose of enabling foreign military forces in less-developed friendly countries to construct public works and to engage in other activities helpful to the economic and social development of such friendly countries." The Managers' amendment to that section makes clear that such sales or leases are also permitted for preventing or hindering the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and the means for delivering such weapons. The urgent and significant nature of these threats to U.S. national security makes it necessary to marshal all available programs, including arms transfers, as appropriate, to halt proliferation.

Sec. 1203. Official reception and representation expenses

This section amends section 43(c) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2792) to increase the annual limit on the amount of funds that may be expended for official reception and representation expenses under the Arms Export Control Act from $72,500 to $86,500. Reception and representational expenses are an important part of the successful conduct of the Security Cooperation Program. Since 1993, the amount authorized for these expenses has remained at the same ceiling of $72,500.

An additional increase for representational and entertainment expenses was sought by the Department of Defense through the fiscal year 2002 budget request for the Foreign Military Financing (FMF) Program, which is included in the Foreign Operations Appropriation. That FMF request, combined with section 1203, results in the total representational fund budget used by the Security Cooperation Organizations, to include the Security Assistance Offices (SAOs). Since 1993, an additional 33 SAOs have been opened. These additional 33 SAOs require new representational funding that is comparable to what SAOs in other countries receive, which is $2,000 per office. The Department of Defense has indicated that section 1203 will result in no additional costs to that Department.

Sec. 1204. Arms Export Control Act prohibition on transactions with countries that have repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism

This section modifies section 40 of the Arms Export Control Act (AECA), which prohibits transactions with countries that have repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism.

Section 40 of the AECA (22 U.S.C. 2780) prohibits various arms transactions with certain countries, and subsection (d) of that section applies those limits to any country that the Secretary of State determines has repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism. Such acts shall include all activities that the Secretary determines willfully aid or abet the international proliferation of nuclear explosive devices to individuals or groups or willfully aid or abet an individual or groups in acquiring unsafeguarded special nuclear material.

The Managers believe that willfully aiding or abetting the proliferation of chemical, biological, or radiological agents to individuals or groups is an activity equally deserving of sanction under section 40 of AECA. Inclusion of the term, "radiological agents," is not meant to bar legitimate and legal transfers of radiological material, such as nuclear reactor fuel or medical or industrial isotopes, for purely peaceful purposes. The Managers do intend, however, that if a country contributes to the proliferation of such materials to be used as or in radiological weapons, or with the knowledge or reason to believe that they would be so used, then section 40 of AECA should be applied.

Sec. 1205. Congressional notification of small arms and light weapons license approval; reports

This section amends section 36(c) of the Arms Export Control Act (AECA) to require that arms transfers consisting of defense articles that are firearms controlled under category I of the United States Munitions List be notified to the Congress, if such proposed transfers are valued at $1,000,000 or more.

This section also includes three reporting requirements. First, this section amends section 40 of the AECA to require the executive branch to report on the numbers, range, and findings of end-use monitoring of U.S. transfers of small and light weapons. Second, this section amends section 655 of the Foreign Assistance Act to require additional information on small arms and light weapons including the aggregate dollar value and quantity of semiautomatic assault weapons or spare parts for such weapons that were licensed for export during the period covered by the report required by section 655. And third, this section requires a one-time report on activities of registered arms brokers.

Sec. 1206. Treatment of Taiwan relating to transfers of defense articles and defense services

This section requires that Taiwan shall be treated as though it were designated a major non-NATO ally for the purposes of the transfer or possible transfer of defense articles or defense services under the Arms Export Control Act, the Foreign Assistance Act or any other provision of law.

SUBTITLE B—INTERNATIONAL MILITARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Sec. 1211. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes $85,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for the International Military Education and Training (IMET) program. This level of funding is an increase of $5,000,000 over the executive branch's request for fiscal year 2003, which reflects the Managers' strong support for the IMET program.

Sec. 1212. Human rights violations

This section requires additional reporting to the Congress regarding human rights violations by participants in the International Military Education and Training (IMET) program.

Current U.S. law requires that prospective IMET participants be screened to ensure that they do not have records of human rights violations. There is no requirement, however, to monitor their human rights records after receiving U.S. training. Last year, Congress mandated a new Department of Defense database on IMET participants after December 31, 2000, which does not require new collection of information but should help the Defense Department to keep track of the training it provides, and where its former students go as their careers progress. One justification for the IMET program is that it provides human rights training and a consciousness about respecting human rights in its participants, who presumably will be more respectful of human rights concerns in their own countries. This provision will allow the executive branch and the Congress to better assess the impact of IMET human rights training.

The Managers believe that if a former IMET participant is found to have been involved in a human rights violation, reported in the Department of State's annual human rights report, that person's previous IMET training should be reported to the Congress. To assist the Secretary of State in determining whether there was any such involvement, section 1212 authorizes the Secretary to obtain from the Secretary of Defense, annually, any IMET participant database information with respect to a list containing the names of foreign personnel or military units. If it should be determined, as a result, that a former IMET participant was involved in a human rights violation, the Department of Defense shall update its IMET participant database to reflect that information. This process will give policymakers—and especially the Department of Defense itself—new information with which to evaluate and improve the effectiveness of IMET courses.

Sec. 1213. Participation in post-undergraduate flying training and tactical leadership programs

This section amends chapter 5 of the Foreign Assistance Act to provide the authority for the President to enter into bilateral or multilateral agreements with friendly foreign countries for the cooperative furnishing of post-undergraduate flying and tactical leadership training on a non-reimbursable basis at facilities in Southwest Asia.

The Managers believe that providing this authority to the President will allow the United States to better utilize the Gulf Air Warfare Center located in the United Arab Emirates. Access to this center will allow the United States to maintain influence with counterparts in the region, and will provide U.S. forces with access to an unparalleled training and range facility.

The Managers expect that the executive branch will work to ensure that the agreements between the U.S. and certain countries in Southwest Asia will be based on the equitable provision of support and services. The Managers intend that the language provided which allows a waiver for the requirement of equitable support and services should be used sparingly, if at all.

SUBTITLE C—SECURITY ASSISTANCE FOR SELECT COUNTRIES

Sec. 1221. Security assistance for Israel and Egypt

This section modifies provisions in current law to authorize Foreign Military Financing (FMF) and Economic Support Funds (ESF) at funding levels and under terms and conditions consistent with the executive branch's request for such programs for fiscal year 2003.

Beginning in fiscal year 2001, the United States began to reduce Economic Support Funds (ESF) assistance to the countries of Israel and Egypt and to replace 50 percent of the reductions in ESF for Israel with an increase in the Foreign Military Financing (FMF) funds for that country. Section 1221 continues that process.

The Managers also note that this section authorizes $200,000,000 in ESF for Israel for fiscal year 2003 for defensive, nonlethal antiterrorism assistance.

Sec. 1222. Security assistance for Greece and Turkey

This section authorizes assistance under the International Military Education and Training (IMET) program for fiscal year 2003 for Greece and Turkey.

This section continues policies established previously, notably in section 512 of the Security Assistance Act of 2000 (P.L. 106-280).

Sec. 1223. Security assistance for certain other countries

This section authorizes assistance for Foreign Military Financing (FMF) and International Military Education and Training (IMET) for fiscal year 2003 for selected countries.

The Managers believe that it is important to specify security assistance amounts for a number of countries of particular concern. In this year's bill, FMF and IMET amounts are specified for the Baltic states, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Georgia, Hungary, Jordan, Malta, the Philippines, Poland, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia. Funding levels for these countries are at or slightly above the executive branch's request for fiscal year 2003.

Sec. 1224. Assistance to Lebanon

This section addresses U.S. assistance for Lebanon. Under this section, $10,000,000 of the Economic Support Funds (ESF) allocated to Lebanon must be withheld for fiscal year 2003 and for all subsequent fiscal years unless and until the President certifies to the appropriate congressional committees for each fiscal year that (1) the armed forces of Lebanon have been deployed to the internationally recognized border between Lebanon and Israel; and (2) the Government of Lebanon is effectively asserting its authority in the area in which such armed forces have been deployed. The withheld funds may not be reprogrammed for any other purpose until the last month of the fiscal year in which the authority to obligate such funds lapses.

This provision is intended to persuade the Government of Lebanon to meet its obligation under UN Security Council Resolution 425, which calls for restoration of the Government of Lebanon's "effective authority" in Southern Lebanon, in the wake of Israel's May 2000 withdrawal from Southern Lebanon. The Israeli withdrawal and compliance with UNSCR 425 was certified by the UN Secretary-General and the UN Security Council President. The Government of Lebanon's failure to comply with UNSCR 425 has resulted in significant control of the border by Hizballah, which has initiated numerous attacks on Israeli soldiers and soil, resulting in several deaths and casualties. Allowing an organization designated as a foreign terrorist organization to operate on the Lebanese border during the war on terrorism is highly destabilizing in this volatile region.

SUBTITLE D—EXCESS DEFENSE ARTICLE AND DRAWDOWN AUTHORITIES

Sec. 1231. Excess defense articles for certain countries

This section authorizes funds of the Department of Defense to be expended for packing and shipping of excess defense articles (EDA) under section 516 of the Foreign Assistance Act.

The EDA program enables the United States to meet foreign policy objectives while simultaneously supporting U.S. friends and allies by improving their defense capabilities and enhancing interoperability, and to reduce U.S. stocks of excess equipment. Most Central and Southern European and Newly Independent States countries urgently seek U.S. EDA to replace former Soviet equipment as both a political statement and a way to enhance interoperability with NATO. In addition, certain countries, such as Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, continue to require EDA as they build their defense forces from zero. Unfortunately, most of these countries cannot afford the packing, crating, handling and transportation (PCH&T) costs associated with EDA as they convert to market economies. Without extended authority to assume those costs, the EDA program becomes virtually unavailable to these countries.

In the Fiscal Year 2000 and 2001 Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Title XII—Security Assistance, sections 1211 and 1212, contained in the Fiscal Year 2001 Appropriations Act, P.L. 106–113, such authority was granted for fiscal year 2000 and fiscal year 2001 for EDA provided to Estonia, Georgia, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Poland, Slovakia, Ukraine, and Uzbekistan. The same authority was provided for Mongolia for fiscal year 2001 and fiscal year 2002 in the Security Assistance Act of 2000, Section 707, P.L. 106–80.

Section 1231 extends these current authorities to fiscal year 2003 for certain specified Central and Southern European and certain other countries. Newly included countries include India, Pakistan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan, all of which have offered assistance in the war on international terrorism.

Sec. 1232. Annual listing of possible excess defense articles

This section amends section 25 of the Arms Export Control Act (AECA) to require that the annual "Javits report" of possible arms transfers for the coming year include a list and amount of weapons systems that are significant military equipment that the executive branch believes are likely to become available for transfer as excess defense articles (EDA) during the next 12 months.

The Managers realize that often it is difficult to determine in advance what defense articles will become available for transfer as EDA and do not expect perfection in an annual listing of such articles. As new significant military equipment is deployed by the United States armed forces, however, the systems it replaces can become available at a predictable rate. Given the increasing strategic role that the transfer of EDA plays in U.S. relations with other countries, the Managers believe that such transfers should be the product of interagency strategic thinking and planning. In order to encourage such a process, section 1232 mandates this new reporting requirement.

Sec. 1233. Leases of defense articles for foreign countries and international organizations

This section modifies section 61 of the Arms Export Control Act (AECA) to provide authority to the President to enter into leases for defense articles from the stocks of the Department of Defense for fixed periods of time longer than five years in instances where the defense articles require major refurbishment work prior to delivery to the lessor foreign country or international organization.

Section 2796(b) of title 22, U.S.C., currently provides that the President may lease defense articles from the stocks of the Department of Defense to eligible foreign countries and international organizations for a fixed duration of not more than five years. Some defense articles require major refurbishment work prior to delivery to the eligible foreign country or international organization. By including the time needed to complete this required refurbishment work in the five-year limit on the overall lease, the actual amount of time the eligible party has the beneficial use of the leased defense article is often significantly reduced. Section 1233 provides authority to the President to enter into such leases for fixed periods of time longer than five years, with the period of time for which a particular lease may exceed five years being defined by the time required to perform the required refurbishment work. The recipient of the leased defense article will pay for the actual cost of the refurbishment work.

In recent years, as an economical and expeditious way to acquire modern defense capabilities to meet their defense requirements in the near term, several NATO allies have sought leases of nonexcess U.S. military fighter aircraft, ships, and tanks that needed major refurbishment. As a result, these allies have committed millions of dollars for the refurbishment work, as well as for the actual lease payments for the defense articles. In addition, they agree to return the refurbished defense articles in as good a condition as when they received them, while taking into consideration normal wear and tear. These major refurbishments may take 18 months or even more, such as with military fighter aircraft. Including the refurbishment time in the five-year lease limit can and often does seriously impact the actual beneficial time of use by the recipient.

In addition, adding a definition of "major refurbishment work" clearly identifies the specific activity that is acceptable outside the five-year lease limit and articulates the minimum period of time for such activity. The specific activity must be "major refurbishment work," and the minimum period of time for such activity is established at six months. The time required to complete the major refurbishment work, rather than the costs associated with this activity, must be the defining point, because it is the delay in delivery and the subsequent reduced amount of time of beneficial use by the recipient that is the major concern.

Sec. 1234. Priority with respect to transfer of excess defense articles

This section amends section 516 of the Foreign Assistance Act to require that the Philippines, along with other eligible countries pursuant to that section, receive priority with respect to the delivery of excess defense articles.

SUBTITLE E—OTHER POLITICAL-MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Sec. 1241. Destruction of surplus weapons stockpiles

This section authorizes that of the assistance made available in fiscal year 2003 to carry out chapters 1 and 10 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act (relating to development assistance), up to $10,000,000 is authorized to be made available for the destruction of surplus stockpiles of small arms, light weapons, and other munitions.

From time to time, the United States has supported programs in developing countries to buy back and/or destroy small arms, light weapons, and other munitions that might otherwise be used in criminal activities or ethnic conflicts. Such programs can be especially useful in a country that is emerging from a period of civil war, as was the case in the country of Mali a few years ago when a U.S.-assisted gun buy-back program succeeded in removing from circulation a large number of weapons.

The Managers believe that carefully chosen programs of this sort should be encouraged. Since such programs may be vital to giving a country the stability that is needed for social and economic development, the Managers believe also that the judicious use of development assistance funds for this purpose is warranted. The small arms destruction program is expected to receive $2,000,000 in fiscal year 2003 from the funds allotted to "Nonproliferation, Anti-terrorism, Demining, and Related Programs." Section 1241 does not require that additional funds be made available to this program, but does give the Secretary that option. The Managers believe that these funds should not detract from existing or planned developmental or assistance projects using funds under this chapter of the Foreign Assistance Act.

SUBTITLE F—ANTITERRORISM ASSISTANCE

Sec. 1251. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes $73,000,000 for fiscal year 2002 and $64,200,000 for fiscal year 2003 for antiterrorism assistance, which reflect the executive branch's request.

The Managers express their strong continued support for the Department of State's antiterrorism assistance programs, which play an important role in improving other countries' ability to protect U.S. diplomatic and military personnel overseas.

Sec. 1261. Additions to United States war reserves stockpiles for allies

This section amends section 514 of the Foreign Assistance Act to provide authority to transfer excess munitions items in the value of $100,000,000 to the war reserve stockpile (WRSA) in Israel.

The Managers note that providing authority to enhance the WRSA in Israel supports the European Command's (USEUCOM) strategy of forward engagement and assists the defense of Israel.

Sec. 1262. Revised military assistance reporting requirements

This section amends section 656 of the Foreign Assistance Act (FAA) to make clear that the annual foreign military training report does not apply to any NATO ally, Australia, Japan or New Zealand, unless one of the appropriate committees of Congress has specifically requested in writing the inclusion of such country in the report. As a matter of practice, each committee will file such written request regarding a country if either the chairman or the ranking minority member of that committee determines that such a request is advisable.

In addition, this section eliminates two reporting requirements. First, this section amends section 655 of the FAA to delete that portion of the annual military assistance report which requires information relating to military imports. And second, this section amends section 36 of the Arms Export Control Act to delete a portion of a report which requires estimates of U.S. military personnel, U.S. Government civilian personnel and U.S. civilian contract personnel in foreign countries assisting in the implementation of security assistance programs.

This section requires the President to provide biannual detailed briefings and consult with the Congress regarding U.S. security assistance to Taiwan, including the provision of defense articles and defense services.

The purpose of this provision is to embed in permanent law the briefing and consultation process with regard to arms transfers to Taiwan that has been required in annual appropriations laws and that reflects the current practice adopted by the executive branch.

Title XIII—Nonproliferation and Export Control Assistance

SUBTITLE A—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Sec. 1301. Authorization of appropriations

This section authorizes $162,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for Nonproliferation and Export Control Assistance. Of this amount, $2,000,000 is authorized for section 584 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as added by section 1303 of this Act, and $65,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 for science and technology centers in the independent states of the former Soviet Union. Finally, $382,400,000 is authorized for fiscal year 2003 for "Nonproliferation, Antiterrorism, Demining, and Related Programs."

Sec. 1302. Nonproliferation technology acquisition programs for friendly foreign countries

The Managers have consistently supported programs to improve the border security and export control services of friendly foreign countries. Providing reasonably sophisticated detection equipment to those countries can help stem the flow of materials usable in weapons of mass destruction, whether they are radioactive materials or equipment for the manufacture of chemical weapons. To this end, section 1302 authorizes the Department of State to spend up to $5 million annually to buy nuclear, chemical, and biological detection systems for other countries' export control services, as well as $10 million a year for x-ray systems to image sea-cargo containers. The Managers do not intend for these programs to take away from any existing programs or authorities. Rather, these are intended to be two very specific additions to the nonproliferation and export control tool kit.

To make effective use of these funds, however, the Secretary should develop and budget for a multiyear training plan to assist foreign personnel in the utilization of these detection systems. Although multiyear training will not be required in every case, it will in some; and follow-up training to ensure proper use and maintenance of the equipment will guard against the provision of equipment that is never used or that falls quickly into disrepair. The provision requires the Secretary to submit annual reports for four years to the Senate Foreign Relations and House International Relations Committees describing the systems provided and the progress, status, and budget for a multiyear training program to operate those systems.

Sec. 1303. International nonproliferation and export control training

The Department of State, working with other U.S. Government agencies and with governments and non-governmental organizations in friendly countries, has done much to improve export control law, regulations, procedures, and equipment around the world—and most notably in the independent states of the former Soviet Union. The Managers have supported these programs and worked to expand them. The Managers believe that such training, and especially training conducted in the United States where participants can observe a sophisticated export control system firsthand, deserves specific attention in the law. Section 1303 therefore adds nonproliferation export control training to the activities specifically authorized by Chapter 9 of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act.

Education and training conducted under this section shall be of a technical nature, emphasizing techniques for detecting, deterring, monitoring, interdicting, and countering proliferation. The Managers see education and training in export control law, regulation, organization, and procedures as fully compliant with this requirement, although we must also train foreign personnel in detection and investigative techniques. The Managers also intend that this section not interfere with education and training programs that take place overseas. Rather, it reflects the Managers' belief that one important element in export control training consists of exposing participants to how our own export control system combines effectiveness with adherence to democratic principles and the rule of law.

Sec. 1304. Relocation of scientists

From 1992 through its expiration in 1996, the Soviet Scientists Immigration Act (P.L. 102-509) allowed a total of up to 750 highly skilled scientists and their families to be admitted to the United States without meeting the normal requirement that an alien's services in the sciences, arts, or business be sought by an employer in the United States. Section 1304 revives this law for another 4 years and increases to 950 the total number of such scientists who, over the two 4-year periods, having met criteria set by the Attorney General, may be so admitted. The Attorney General is directed to consult with other departments and agencies to determine whether any changes are needed in the regulations governing this program, and use of this provision is denied to a scientist who has previously been granted the status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

Sec. 1305. International Atomic Energy Agency regular budget assessments

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is a particularly important international organization. It furthers U.S. national security objectives by helping to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons material, especially through its work on effective verification and safeguards measures. The Department of State has concluded that the IAEA "is a critical and effective instrument for verifying compliance with international nuclear nonproliferation agreements, and serves as an essential barrier to the spread of nuclear weapons." The organization is poised to become even more active and important, moreover, as more countries sign the new model safeguards protocol that grants the IAEA the right to inspect undeclared facilities, and as the nuclear weapons states seek its help in verifying warhead or fissile material storage or destruction agreements. In addition, in March 2002, the IAEA established an important new program to reduce the risks of nuclear or radiological terrorism.

Nearly two decades of "zero budget growth" have impaired the ability of the IAEA to carry out its mission and to hire and retain the most qualified inspectors and Managers. The proportion of safeguards inspectors who hold doctorate degrees has fallen from 32 percent in 1985 to 19 percent in 2000. In June 2001, IAEA Director General Dr. Mohamed El Baradei told his Board of Governors that zero real growth had left the safeguards mission underfunded by $20 million in the regular budget, which "led to a situation where . . . we are in a position to carry out only adequate safeguards, not optimum safeguards, owing to our inability to modernize equipment and make full use of available new technologies." Voluntary contributions by the United States lessen the IAEA's budgetary constraints, but they cannot readily be used for the long-term capital investments or permanent staff increases necessary for an effective IAEA safeguards regime.

In light of these real problems in an agency upon which the United States depends to enforce the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, the Managers believe that a gradual and sustained increase in the IAEA's regular budget is needed. The Managers also believe that more of that budget should be devoted to nuclear nonproliferation activities, but this cannot be achieved unless the total increases as well.

The IAEA's 2003 regular budget has already been fixed, so no increase in that budget can be achieved before 2004. Given the urgency of attending to materials that pose a risk of being used in nuclear or radiological terrorism, notably research reactor fuels that use fissile material and "orphaned" radioactive sources, this section authorizes a $10,000,000 increase in the United States voluntary contribution to the IAEA for 2003.

The Managers have been informed of the Administration's decision no longer to insist that its approximate share of the IAEA budget be reduced from 25 percent to 22 percent, in keeping with reductions that are required by law in our contributions to most United Nations organizations. Section 308 makes clear that it was not the intent of Congress that the United States' contributions to all United Nations-related organizations and activities be reduced pursuant to the Admiral James W. Nance and Meg Donovan Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 2000 and 2001 (contained in Appendix G of P.L. 106-113), which sets 22 percent assessment rates as benchmarks for the general United Nations budget, the Food and Agricultural Organization, the World Health Organization, and the International Labor Organization. Rather, contributions for an important and effective agency like the IAEA should be maintained at levels commensurate with the criticality of their missions.

This section specifies in greater detail the content of the reports to the Congress that are required pursuant to the Iran Nonproliferation Act of 2000. It also makes clear that if a person only transfers to Iran advanced conventional weapons covered by section 2(a)(1)(E) of the Act, that person is not automatically exempt from sanctions. This amendment to section 5(a)(2) of the Act is in keeping with the original intent of Congress.

This section amends Section 822(a) of the North Korea Threat Reduction Act of 1999 (Subtitle B of title VIII of division A of HR 3427, as enacted into law by section 1000(a)(7)) by substituting for the existing listing of facilities, components, goods and so forth, the term "specified nuclear item," which is further defined as such material, facilities, components, goods, services or technology which would be subject to an Agreement for Cooperation if exported to North Korea; and components that are listed in Annex A or B to the Nuclear Suppliers Group Guidelines.

Sec. 1308. Annual report on the proliferation of missiles and essential components of nuclear, biological, and chemical weapons

This section consolidates four existing reporting requirements into one annual report on the proliferation of missiles and nuclear, biological and chemical weapons.

Sec. 1311. Short title

Sec. 1312. Findings and purposes

This section sets forth findings regarding the United States' security interest in preventing the spread of weapons of mass destruction and reducing world stockpiles of such weapons, especially in the Russian Federation. Among the findings are that existing nonproliferation assistance programs have made substantial progress, but that the threats posed by inadequate management of weapons of mass destruction stockpiles and complexes in the Russian Federation remain urgent, especially the threat that weapons of mass destruction materials or technology will be sold or stolen and diverted to rogue states or terrorists.

New funding streams are needed for programs to stem these threats, and the burden will have to be shared by the Russian Federation, the United States, and other governments. The Russian Federation assumed the Soviet Union's debts and owes roughly $2.7 billion to the United States and perhaps ten times that amount to other advanced industrialized countries. Debt reduction could be designed to provide additional funding for nonproliferation and arms reduction initiatives, and this funding could be especially large if U.S. friends and allies were to follow the U.S. lead in this regard. The bold June 2002 decision of the G-8 at its Kananaskis meeting to provide the Russian Federation "10 plus 10 over 10"—$10,000,000,000 in U.S. nonproliferation assistance and $10,000,000,000 in assistance from the other members over 10 years—includes the possibility of member states using debt reduction as a means of financing this assistance.

This section also states that it is in the vital national security interests of the United States that: all stocks of nuclear weapons and weapons-usable nuclear material in the Russian Federation are secure and accounted for; stocks of nuclear weapons and weapons-usable nuclear material that are excess to military needs in the Russian Federation are monitored and reduced; any chemical or biological weapons, related materials, and facilities in the Russian Federation are destroyed; the Russian Federation's nuclear weapons complex is reduced to a size appropriate to its post-Cold War missions, and its experts in weapons of mass destruction technologies are shifted to gainful and sustainable civilian employment; the Russian Federation's export control system blocks any proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the means of delivering such weapons, and materials, equipment, know-how, or technology that would be used to develop, produce, or deliver such weapons; and these objectives are accomplished with sufficient monitoring and transparency to provide confidence that they have in fact been accomplished and that the funds provided to accomplish these objectives have been spent efficiently and effectively.

Subsection (b) states that the purposes of this subtitle are to facilitate the accomplishment of the United States objectives described in the findings set forth in subsection (a) by providing for the use of a portion of the Russian Federation's foreign debt to fund nonproliferation programs, and to help ensure that the resources made available to the Russian Federation are targeted to the accomplishment of these objectives. This subsection also states that the intent is to allow the use of additional resources for these purposes. Specifically, the Managers do not intend that debt reduction be used as a substitute for current direct assistance to nonproliferation programs in the Russian Federation.

Sec. 1313. Definitions

Section 1313 defines five terms of art. In particular, in this subtitle, the term "appropriate congressional committees" means the Committee on International Relations and the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Sec. 1314. Authority to reduce the Russian Federation's Soviet-era debt obligations to the United States

The Russian Federation has assumed the debts owed by the former Soviet Union, including roughly $480,000,000 in Lend-Lease debt dating back to U.S. assistance during World War II and $2,240,000,000 in debt owed to the United States as a result of credits extended under Title I of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954. Section 1314 authorizes the President to reduce this debt after notifying the appropriate congressional committees of his intention at least 15 days in advance of any formal determination to do so, and allocates such sums as may be necessary in fiscal year 2003 for the cost of reduction in this debt. Debt reduction may be implemented upon entry into force of a "Russian Federation Nonproliferation Investment Agreement" authorized under section 1315. The authority provided by this section shall be available only to the extent, however, that appropriations for the cost (as defined in section 502(5) of the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990) of reducing any debt pursuant to this section are made in advance.

The Managers understand that any debt reduction agreement reached pursuant to this subtitle is likely to involve the full value of the Russian Federation's Soviet-era official debt to the United States. The purpose of the debt reduction will be to provide new funds for nonproliferation programs in the Russian Federation, rather than to provide debt relief to a country that is, after all, meeting its international financial obligations. The Managers hope, therefore, that any debt reduction agreement will encompass not only the face value of the debt, but also the interest or other debt servicing charges that would otherwise be owed.

This section authorizes the President, in consultation with other appropriate officials of the Federal Government, to enter into a "Russian Federation Nonproliferation Investment Agreement" with the Russian Federation concerning the use of the funds saved by that country as a result of any debt reduction provided pursuant to this subtitle. The Managers intend that such an agreement govern any debt reduction provided pursuant to sections 1314.

The Managers are especially cognizant of the need to ensure that funds provided through Russian Federation debt reduction be invested in nonproliferation programs or projects in an efficient and transparent manner. The Russian Federation Nonproliferation Investment Agreement shall therefore ensure that: (1) an amount equal to the value of the debt reduced pursuant to this subtitle will be made available for agreed nonproliferation programs and projects; (2) each such program or project will be approved by the President; (3) administration and oversight of nonproliferation programs and projects will incorporate best practices from established threat reduction and nonproliferation assistance programs; (4) each program or project funded pursuant to the Agreement will be subject to audits conducted by or for the United States Government to confirm that agreed funds are expended on agreed projects and meet agreed targets and benchmarks; (5) unobligated funds for investments pursuant to the Agreement will not be diverted to other purposes; (6) funds allocated to programs and projects pursuant to the Agreement will not be subject to any taxation by the Russian Federation; (7) all matters relating to the intellectual property rights and legal liabilities of United States firms in a given project will be agreed upon before the expenditure of funds would be authorized for that project; and (8) not less than 75 percent of the funds made available for each nonproliferation program or project under the Agreement will be spent in the Russian Federation.

Further, this subsection expresses the sense of Congress that: to the extent practicable, the boards and administrative mechanisms of existing threat reduction and nonproliferation programs should be used in the administration and oversight of programs and projects under the Agreement; the United States and the Russian Federation should consider commissioning the General Accounting Office and the Russian Chamber of Accounts to conduct joint audits to ensure that the funds saved by the Russian Federation as a result of any debt reduction are used exclusively, efficiently, and effectively to implement agreed programs or projects pursuant to the Agreement; and the Agreement should provide for significant penalties if agreed funds are misappropriated, or if the President is unable to certify for two consecutive years that Russia has made material progress in stemming the flow of sensitive goods, technologies, material and know-how related to the design, development, and production of weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them to state sponsors of international terrorism, as required in section 1317.

Sec. 1316. Independent media and the rule of law

The United States has an important interest in encouraging the development of an independent media sector and the rule of law in the Russian Federation. Such developments would help develop Russian involvement in and cooperation with Western political and economic institutions, thereby increasing Russia's economic well-being and its likelihood of maintaining nonproliferation programs on its own (through increased transparency and a decreased incentive to profit from illicit technology sales). They would also make it less likely that a rogue operation to engage in proliferation could ever go undetected or unexposed.

Section 1316 therefore provides that up to 10 percent of the funds saved by the Russian Federation as a result of any debt relief provided pursuant to this subtitle may be used to promote a vibrant, independent media sector and the rule of law in the Russian Federation. The mechanism for this would be an endowment to support the establishment of a "Center for an Independent Press and the Rule of Law" in the Russian Federation, which shall be directed by a joint United States-Russian Board of Directors in which the majority of members, including the chairman, shall be United States personnel, and which shall be responsible for the management of the endowment, its funds, and the Center's programs. While the President is not obligated to use the authority provided by this section, given events in Russia over the past year, in which independent media outlets have been closed or placed under government control, the Managers strongly urge the executive branch to explore exercising this authority.

Sec. 1317. Restrictions on debt reduction authority

The overarching framework for debt-for-nonproliferation under this subtitle is that benefits to the Russian Federation that flow from debt reduction and devoting the funds saved to nonproliferation programs are greater than any similar benefits gained from the proliferation of sensitive items and technologies to state sponsors of terrorism. As such, the first condition of any debt reduction is the need for the Russian Federation to stem the flow of sensitive goods, technologies, material, and know-how related to the research, design, development, and production of weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them to countries that have been determined by the Secretary of State to have repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism. In particular, the Managers are most concerned regarding the proliferation of dual-use nuclear and missile goods, technologies, materials, and know-how to Iran. Section 1317 therefore conditions section 1314 concerning the authority to grant debt reduction by requiring the President to certify to the appropriate committees of Congress that the Russian Federation has made and continues to make "material progress" toward that end before any debt reduction can be provided. For this purpose, 'material progress' is defined as significant, measurable, and demonstrable reductions in Russian proliferation as measured on an annual basis. Until that certification can be made, no debt reduction can be provided, unless the President waives this requirement pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c).

This section also states in subsection (b) that if in any subsequent annual report to Congress submitted pursuant to section 1317 the President cannot certify that the Russian Federation continues to meet the condition required in subsection (a), then the authorities granted under this subtitle may not be exercised and funds may not be expended, unless and until such certification is made to the appropriate congressional committees. Under subsection (c), the President may waive the requirements of subsections (a) and (b) for a given fiscal year if the President determines that the imposition of those requirements in that fiscal year would be detrimental to the national interest of the United States and so reports to the appropriate committees of Congress.

Sec. 1318. Discussion of Russian Federation debt reduction for nonproliferation with other creditor states

Western countries, other than the United States, hold roughly 90 percent of the Russian Federation's Soviet-era official bilateral debt. Were these countries to join with the United States in allowing this debt to be used for nonproliferation programs in the Russian Federation, the funds available for such purposes would be greatly enhanced. Section 1318 expresses the sense of Congress that the President and other appropriate officials designated by the President should pursue discussions with other creditor states to: ensure that other advanced industrial democracies, especially the largest holders of Soviet-era Russian debt, dedicate significant proportions of their bilateral official debt with the Russian Federation or equivalent amounts of direct assistance to the G–8 Global Partnership against the Spread of Weapons and Materials of Mass Destruction, as agreed upon in the Statement by G–8 Leaders on June 27, 2002; and reach agreement, as appropriate, to establish a unified Russian Federation official debt reduction fund to manage and provide financial transparency for the resources provided by creditor states through debt reductions.

Sec. 1319. Implementation of United States policy

This section expresses the sense of Congress that implementation of debt-for-nonproliferation programs with the Russian Federation should be overseen by the coordinating mechanism established pursuant to section 1334 of this Act. This interagency committee is intended to coordinate all U.S. Government nonproliferation programs in the former Soviet Union and will be best situated to provide efficient and effective oversight and management of both existing nonproliferation programs and programs or projects resulting from any debt reduction.

Sec. 1320. Consultations with Congress

This section requires the President to consult with the appropriate congressional committees on a periodic basis to review the implementation of this subtitle and the Russian Federation's eligibility for debt reduction pursuant to this subtitle.

Sec. 1321. Annual reports to Congress

This section requires the President, no later than December 31, 2003, and annually by December 31 of each subsequent year, to prepare and transmit to Congress a report concerning actions taken to implement this subtitle during the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year in which the report is transmitted. The report shall include (1) a description of the activities undertaken pursuant to this subtitle during the fiscal year; (2) a description of the nature and amounts of the loans reduced pursuant to this subtitle during the fiscal year; (3) a description of any agreement entered into under this subtitle; (4) a description of the progress during the fiscal year of any projects funded pursuant to this subtitle; (5) a summary of the results of relevant audits performed in the fiscal year; and (6) a certification, if appropriate, that the Russian Federation continues to meet the condition required by section 1317(a) and an explanation as to why such certification was or was not made.

SUBTITLE C—NONPROLIFERATION ASSISTANCE COORDINATION

Sec. 1331. Short title

This section states that this subtitle may be cited as the "Nonproliferation Assistance Coordination Act of 2002."

Sec. 1332. Findings

This section states the findings of Congress. United States nonproliferation efforts in the independent states of the former Soviet Union have achieved important results in keeping weapons of mass destruction and related material, technology and knowledge out of the hands of terrorists and rogue states. The many U.S. programs are managed by several departments, however, and repeated studies have cited a lack of effective coordination. For example, the Russia Task Force of the Secretary of Energy Advisory Board, chaired by former Senator (and now Ambassador) Howard Baker and former White House counsel Lloyd Cutler, said of these programs: "Coordination within and among U.S. Government agencies is insufficient and must be improved." (Cited in Howard Baker and Lloyd Cutler, Co-Chairs, Russia Task Force, Secretary of Energy Advisory Board, A Report Card on the Department of Energy's Nonproliferation Programs with Russia, January 10, 2001, p. 23.)

The Administration formed an interagency mechanism for its review of these programs, and the Managers believe that a similar approach is needed for continuing high-level coordination among programs. Private sector spending and foreign investment are increasingly important sources of employment for ex-weapons scientists in the former Soviet Union. Some of these efforts are channeled through U.S. Government or U.S.-supported institutions like the Department of Energy's Initiatives for Proliferation Prevention program, the State Department's International Science and Technology Centers program and the Cooperative Research and Development Foundation. The Managers also believe that nongovernmental efforts, like those of Ted Turner's Nuclear Threat Initiative, will also play an important role, however, and the U.S. Government should coordinate its efforts with those of the private sector.

This section defines terms used in this subtitle. It defines the term "independent states of the former Soviet Union" to have the meaning given the term in section 3 of the FREEDOM Support Act (22 U.S.C. 5801). "Appropriate committees of Congress" is defined to mean the Committees on Foreign Relations, Armed Services, and Appropriations of the Senate and the Committees on International Relations, Armed Services, and Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

Sec. 1334. Establishment of committee on nonproliferation assistance

This section directs the President to establish a mechanism to coordinate U.S. efforts in formulating and carrying out programs for achieving nonproliferation and threat reduction. This mechanism shall include: representatives designated, respectively, by the Secretaries of State, Defense, Energy, and Commerce, the Attorney General, and the Director of the Office of Homeland Security or such successor department or agency; and any other executive branch official the President selects. Each department or agency representative should, to the maximum extent possible, have been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President shall designate the chair of the coordination mechanism, and the chair may invite the head of any other department or agency to send a representative to participate from time to time in the activities of the coordinating committee.

Sec. 1335. Purposes and authority

This section directs that the interagency coordination mechanism should have the authority to commission analyses on issues relating to coordination of nonproliferation assistance programs within the U.S. Government, between the U.S. public and private sectors, and between the United States and other countries. Within the U.S. Government, the coordination mechanism should provide guidance to coordinate, de-conflict and maximize the utility of nonproliferation assistance programs. It should also consider and make recommendations, as necessary, to the President and Congress regarding proposals for new legislation or regulations relating to U.S. nonproliferation efforts in the independent states of the former Soviet Union. Given the large number of departments and congressional committees with a role in this effort, it will be especially useful for the Administration to bring agencies together and make coherent recommendations regarding the increased nonproliferation efforts that are clearly required today. As the aforementioned Baker-Cutler task force stated in its report to the Secretary of Energy, "[t]he most urgent unmet national security threat to the United States today is the danger that weapons of mass destruction or weapons-usable material in Russia could be stolen and sold to terrorists or hostile nation-states and used against American troops abroad or citizens at home." (P. iii)

Sec. 1336. Administrative support

This section directs that all United States departments and agencies shall provide, to the extent permitted by law, such information and assistance as may be requested by the coordination mechanism in carrying out its functions and activities established pursuant to section 1334.

Sec. 1337. Confidentiality of information

This section assures that information which has been submitted or received in confidence shall not be publicly disclosed, except to the extent required by law, and such information shall be used by the coordination mechanism only for the purpose of carrying out the functions and activities set forth in this subtitle. This section does not, in and of itself, exempt such information from the Freedom of Information Act. It is intended, rather, to underscore the need for departmental representatives to discuss candidly the successes and shortfalls of their nonproliferation assistance programs and to enable committee members to "think outside the box" in formulating guidance for executive branch programs and recommendations to the President and Congress.

Sec. 1338. Statutory construction

Section 1338 makes clear that the Nonproliferation Assistance Coordination Act of 2002 does not remove the existing authority of any U.S. department or agency over nonproliferation efforts in the independent states of the former Soviet Union. The interagency coordination mechanism is not to be an operational agency. This subtitle does not give it the budgetary authority vested in the executive branch departments or in the Office of Management and Budget. Neither does this subtitle apply to any activity that is reportable pursuant to title V of the National Security Act of 1947 (50 U.S.C. 413 et seq.).

Sec. 1339. Reporting and consultation

Section 1339 stipulates that not later than 120 days after each inauguration of a President of the United States of America, the President shall submit a report to the Congress on his or her general and specific nonproliferation and threat reduction objectives and how the efforts of executive branch agencies will be coordinated most effectively, pursuant to section 1334 of this Act, to achieve those objectives.

SUBTITLE D—IRAN NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION PREVENTION ACT OF 2002

Sec. 1341. Short title

This section states that this subtitle may be cited as the "Iran Nuclear Proliferation Act of 2002."

Sec. 1342. Withholding of voluntary contributions to the IAEA for programs and projects in Iran

This section amends Section 307 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2227) by adding at the end the following: "(d) (1) Notwithstanding subsection (c), if the Secretary of State determines that programs and projects of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Iran are inconsistent with United States nuclear nonproliferation and safety goals, will provide Iran with training or expertise relevant to the development of nuclear weapons, or are being used as a cover for the acquisition of sensitive nuclear technology, the limitations of subsection (a) shall apply to such programs and projects, and the Secretary of State shall so notify the appropriate congressional committees (as defined in section 3 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 2003.)"

Sec. 1343. Annual review by Secretary of State of programs and projects of the IAEA; U.S. opposition to certain programs and projects of the agency

This section directs the Secretary to undertake a comprehensive annual review of all programs and projects of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in the countries described in section 307(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (U.S.C. 2227(a)) and shall determine if such programs and projects are consistent with United States nuclear nonproliferation and safety goals. The Secretary shall also, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, and on an annual basis thereafter for five years, submit to Congress a report containing the results of this review.

This section also directs the Secretary to direct the United States representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency to oppose programs of the Agency that are determined by the Secretary under the review conducted under subsection (a)(1) to be inconsistent with nuclear nonproliferation and safety goals of the United States.

Sec. 1344, Reporting requirements

This section requires that, not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, and on an annual basis thereafter for five years, the Secretary, in consultation with the United States representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, shall prepare and submit to Congress a report that contains (1) a description of the total amount of annual assistance to Iran from the International Atomic Energy Agency; (2) a list of Iranian officials in leadership positions at the Agency; (3) the expected time frame for the completion of the nuclear power reactors at the Bushehr nuclear power plant; (4) a summary of the nuclear materials and technology transferred to Iran from the Agency in the preceding year that could assist in the development of Iran's nuclear weapons program; and (5) a description of all programs and projects of the International Atomic Energy Agency in each country described in section 307(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2227(a)) and any inconsistencies between the technical cooperation and assistance programs and projects of the Agency and United States nuclear nonproliferation and safety goals in those countries. The report required to be submitted under subsection (a) shall be submitted in an unclassified form, to the extent appropriate, but may include a classified annex.

Sec. 1345. Sense of Congress

This section states the sense of Congress that the President should pursue internal reforms at the International Atomic Energy Agency that will ensure that all programs and projects funded under the Technical Cooperation and Assistance Fund of the Agency are compatible with United States nuclear nonproliferation policy and international nuclear nonproliferation norms. Pursuant to section 307 of the Foreign Assistance Act, the Managers note the continued restrictions in that provision regarding Cuba which include limitations on U.S. funding for IAEA technical cooperation activities in that country.

Title XIV—Expediting the Munitions Licensing Process

Sec. 1401. License officer staffing

This section authorizes $10,000,000 for fiscal year 2003 to be appropriated for "Diplomatic and Consular Programs" for salaries and expenses of the Office of Defense Trade Controls of the Department. This section also requires that, effective January 1, 2003, the Secretary shall assign to the Office of Defense Trade Controls of the Department a sufficient number of license review officers to ensure that the average weekly caseload for each officer does not routinely exceed 40. It is important to note that, given the qualitative differences between individual cases (e.g., in their technical complexity), the caseload for some license review officers might appropriately be significantly fewer than 40 cases per week.

Finally, given the priority placed on expedited license reviews in recent years by the Department of Defense, this section states that the Secretary of Defense should ensure that military officers are continuously detailed to the Office of Defense Trade Controls of the Department of State on a nonreimbursable basis.

Sec. 1402. Funding for database automation

This section directs that of the amount authorized to be appropriated under the appropriations account of the Department entitled "Capital Investment Fund" for fiscal year 2003, $4,000,000 is authorized to be available for the Office of Defense Trade Controls of the Department for the modernization of information management.

Sec. 1403. Information management priorities

Sec. 1403 requires the Secretary to establish a secure, Internet-based system for the filing and review of applications for export of United States Munitions List items. Of the amount made available pursuant to section 1402, $3,000,000 is authorized to be available to fully automate the Defense Trade Application System, and to ensure that the system: (1) is a secure, electronic system for the filing and review of Munitions List license applications; (2) is accessible by United States companies through the Internet for the purpose of filing and tracking their Munitions List license applications; and (3) is capable of exchanging data with the Export Control Automated Support System of the Department of Commerce, the Foreign Disclosure and Technology Information System and the USXPORTS systems of the Department of Defense, the Export Control System of the Central Intelligence Agency, and the Proliferation Information Network System of the Department of Energy.

Sec. 1404. Improvements to the automated export system

Section 1404 mandates that the Secretary of Commerce, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, publish regulations in the Federal Register to require, upon the effective date of those regulations, filing through the Automated Export System for the remainder of exports that were not covered by regulations issued pursuant to section 1252(b) of the Security Assistance Act of 1999 (113 Stat. 1501A at 1536, as enacted into law by section 1000(a)(7) of Public Law 106–113; 13 U.S.C. 301 note).

This section also requires the Secretary of State to conclude an information-sharing arrangement with the heads of the United States Customs Service and the Census Bureau to adjust the Automated Export System to parallel information currently collected by the Department of State.

This section also significantly increases the penalties for failure to file export declarations through the Automated Export System and for knowingly failing to file or filing misleading export information through the Shippers Export Declaration (or any successor document) or the Automated Export System. It sets forth procedures for civil penalty imposition by the Department of Commerce, but permits other agencies to use their own procedures if the Secretary of Commerce delegates enforcement functions to them. It also authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to designate officers or employees of the Office of Export Enforcement to conduct investigations pursuant to chapter 9 of title 13 of the U.S. Code (on the census). In conducting such investigations, those officers or employees may, to the extent necessary or appropriate to the enforcement of this chapter, exercise such authorities as are conferred upon them by other laws of the United States, subject to policies and procedures approved by the Attorney General. The Commissioner of Customs is given similar authority to designate officers or employees of the Customs Service to enforce the provisions of this chapter, or to conduct investigations pursuant to this chapter. Finally, this section authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to promulgate regulations for the implementation and enforcement of this section. The criminal fines provided for in this section are exempted from the provisions of section 3571 of title 18, United States Code. A clerical amendment to the table of sections at the beginning of chapter 9 of title 13, United States Code, strikes the item relating to section 305 and inserts, "305. Penalties for unlawful export information activities."

Pursuant to section 36 of the Arms Export Control Act, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House International Relations Committee receive prior notice of hundreds of arms sales each year. As inflation and improved technology have raised the cost of weapons systems, the old dollar thresholds in the law have forced the reporting of more and more export licenses that are of no substantive interest to either committee, but that necessarily subject U.S. companies to additional delays due to the requirement for congressional consideration.

This section sets new prior notice thresholds of $25,000,000 for major defense equipment and $100,000,000 for other items, and $300,000,000 for design and construction services, which will apply to most sales to NATO members, Australia, Japan or New Zealand. The one exception will be sales to one or more of those countries that incorporate a new or increased sales territory that includes a country outside of that group. The Managers believe that approval of such a sales territory is tantamount to approving future sales to the listed countries, and sometimes such third-country sales pose security or policy concerns. The Managers note that discussions on the issue of notification thresholds with the Department of State and the Department of Defense will continue in the coming year.

This section requires the President to provide 30 days' notice to the Congress in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprogramming justifications under section 634A(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 of any items proposed to be removed from the Munitions List. The Defense Trade Security Initiative calls for a review of the Munitions List every 4 years. The Managers understand that the Administration is currently reviewing a portion of the list to determine if items warrant removal from the list. While the recent completion of the review of one-quarter of the Munitions List did not remove any items to the detriment of U.S. national security, the Managers believe that the oversight responsibilities of Congress with regard to the sale of lethal military arms would be prudently exercised by the opportunity to review under these procedures any proposed deletions to the Munitions List. The Managers trust that continued consultation with the Department of State over the ongoing review of and changes to the Munitions List will allow any alterations to the Munitions List to occur without undue delay, controversy, or diminution of U.S. national security.

Title XV—National Security Assistance Strategy

Sec. 1501. Briefing on the strategy

Foreign Military Financing (FMF), transfers of excess defense articles (EDA), and International Military Education and Training (IMET) are justified not simply in military terms, but as contributions to the overall national security of the United States. The fact that they are authorized in the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act reflects a recognition that they are intended primarily to serve foreign policy objectives.

It can be most difficult, however, to keep foreign policy objectives in the forefront when the details of program implementation involve detailed issues of military efficiency at home and abroad. The Managers believe that the State Department must develop a national security assistance strategy that integrates the FMF, EDA and IMET programs, on a country-by-country basis, into the National Security Strategy of the United States. This will bring greater coherence to those programs and ensure that they achieve maximum benefits for U.S. foreign policy. The Managers appreciate the fact that relevant officials are trying to impose greater strategic and policy discipline on these programs, and they expect to see tangible results in this regard.

This section directs that, no later than March 31, 2003, officials of the Department of State and the Department of Defense shall brief the appropriate congressional committees regarding their plans and progress in formulating and implementing a national security assistance strategy. This briefing shall include: (a) how, and to what extent, the elements of the strategy recommended in section 501(b) of the Security Assistance Act of 2000 (22 U.S.C. 2305(b)) have been or will be incorporated in security assistance plans and decisions; (b) the number of outyears considered in the strategy; (c) actions taken to include the programs listed in section 501(c) of the Security Assistance Act of 2000 (22 U.S.C. 2305(c)), as well as similar programs of military training or other assistance to the military or security forces of a foreign country; (d) how a national security assistance strategy is being implemented regarding specific countries; (e) any programmatic changes adopted or expected as a result of adopting a strategic approach to security assistance policymaking; (f) any obstacles encountered in formulating or implementing a national security assistance strategy; and (g) any resources or legislative needs highlighted by this process. It is especially important to include similar programs other than FMF, EDA, and IMET, so that uniform policy and standards are maintained over all such programs.

Sec. 1502. Security assistance surveys

This section encourages the Secretary of State to use security assistance surveys in the preparation of a national security assistance strategy. This section also authorizes $2,000,000 to be available to the Secretary to conduct security assistance surveys, or request such surveys by the Department of Defense or other U.S. agencies on a reimbursable basis.

Title XVI—Miscellaneous Provisions

Sec. 1601. Nuclear and missile nonproliferation in South Asia

The war against terrorism has made South Asia a military theater of operations and has produced new, cooperative relations between the United States and both India and Pakistan. It has not reduced, however, the risk that this region will contribute to the proliferation, or even the use, of nuclear weapons. Indeed, concern over the security of special nuclear material in South Asia has been heightened by the increased tension in the area. In promulgating a statement of United States policy on nonproliferation objectives in South Asia, the Managers intend that the executive branch maintain and demonstrate a high priority for these concerns. Osama bin Laden's efforts to acquire weapons of mass destruction make clear that nonproliferation is now part and parcel of the war on terrorism, and not a subsidiary issue. The Committee also intends that all U.S. policy and actions on nuclear issues in South Asia be consistent with United States obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (21 U.S.T. 483) and with past U.S. policy on these matters.

To this end, subsection (a) states that it shall be the policy of the United States, consistent with its obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, to encourage and work with the governments of India and Pakistan to achieve nonproliferation objectives by September 30, 2003, including: the continuation of a nuclear testing moratorium; a commitment not to deploy nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles that can carry nuclear weapons and to restrain the ranges and types of missiles developed or deployed; agreement by both governments to bring their export controls in accord with the guidelines established by the major international nonproliferation regimes; establishment of a modern, effective system to control the export of sensitive dual-use items, technology, technical information, and materiel that can be used in the design, development, or production of weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles; and bilateral meetings between senior Indian and Pakistani officials to discuss security issues and establish confidence-building measures with respect to nuclear policies and programs.

Subsection (b) states that it shall be the policy of the United States, consistent with its obligations under the Treaty on the Nonproliferation of Nuclear Weapons, to encourage and, where appropriate, to work with the Governments of India and Pakistan to achieve not later than September 30, 2003, the establishment by those governments of modern, effective systems to protect and secure their nuclear devices and materiel from unauthorized use, accidental employment, or theft. Any such dialogue with India or Pakistan would not be represented or considered, nor would it be intended, as granting any recognition to India or Pakistan, as appropriate, as a nuclear weapon state (as defined in the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons).

Finally, this section requires the President to submit, not later than March 1, 2003, to the appropriate congressional committees a report describing United States efforts to achieve the objectives listed in subsections (a) and (b), the progress made toward the achievement of those objectives, and the likelihood that each objective will be achieved by September 30, 2003.

One area in which policy and science both benefit from close collaboration is seismology—the study of disturbances in the earth's crust. Scientists measure seismic waves primarily to study earthquakes and to differentiate them from rock falls and manmade explosions. Public benefits from this work have included a better understanding of earthquakes, improved ability to warn of possible tsunamis so that people can move to higher ground, monitoring of volcanos for public safety purposes, improved techniques to locate oil reserves, and the detection and characterization of nuclear weapons tests. Data gathered for national security reasons can in turn be of great use to science. Pursuant to the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty, an International Monitoring System (IMS) is being put in place that will link 170 seismic monitoring stations, including some that are new or in locations to which outside observers have not previously had access. The United States participates in the development of the IMS and receives near-real time data from the seismic and other sensors in that system.

These data, if made available to scientists in a timely fashion, would improve worldwide earthquake monitoring capabilities. Combining IMS data with seismological data from sites outside the IMS will, in turn, enable scientists to assist governments—including our own—in determining whether an unusual seismic event was a nuclear weapons test. The United States has pressed for near-real time release of IMS data to the public, but has not achieved international consensus in favor of that.

The Managers believe that more must be done to bring about the timely release of these data. The case for letting all the world's experts obtain these data in a timely fashion is one that every country should understand: more complete data and competitive analysis decrease the risk that an event will be misinterpreted. And if, as appears to be the case, nearly all countries accept this argument, then they ought to act upon that, either through appropriate international organizations or through separate bilateral or multilateral agreements regarding each country's data.

Section 1602 directs the head of the Air Force Technical Applications Center (AFTAC) to make available to the public, as soon as possible after receipt, all raw seismological data provided to the United States Government by any international monitoring organization that is directly responsible for seismological monitoring. AFTAC is the U.S. Government agency that gathers these data, so its director is an appropriate official to release them.

Sec. 1603. Detailing U.S. governmental personnel to international arms control and nonproliferation organizations

United States Government personnel have performed important work for international organizations over the years. One well-known example was UNSCOM, the United Nations Special Commission in Iraq, which conducted inspections in that country in an effort to locate and destroy weapons of mass destruction capabilities. Such details of U.S. personnel serve both our own national interest and the world's need for technical and logistical expertise in these crucial organizations. Too often, however, the personnel detailed to international organizations find that their careers suffer because they have spent months or years away from their home offices and outside normal personnel career paths. This section directs the Secretary of State to develop measures whereby U.S. personnel may be detailed to international arms control and nonproliferation organizations without having their careers suffer, and to report to the appropriate committees no later than May 1, 2003, on measures taken.

Sec. 1604. Diplomatic presence overseas

As the events since September 11, 2001, have made all too clear, antiterrorism and nonproliferation are increasingly important elements of American foreign and national security policy. These are not issues that America can handle alone. Rather, we must enlist other nations to do their part as well, both at home and in international fora. To meet the challenges of the 21st century, U.S. missions overseas must have high-level personnel who have both language training and substantive expertise in nonproliferation and political military affairs.

This section authorizes the Secretary of State to create the position of Counselor for Nonproliferation and Political Military Affairs at U.S. missions overseas, to be filled by career Civil Service officers or Foreign Service officers who will receive, as a rule, 10 months of special substantive or language training before assuming their posts.

On April 24, 1997, the Senate provided its advice and consent to ratification of the Chemical Weapons Convention subject to the condition, among others, that the President certify that no sample collected in the United States pursuant to the Convention will be transferred for analysis to any laboratory outside the territory of the United States. Congress enacted the same condition into law as section 304(f)(1) of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 (22 U.S.C. 6724(f)(1)). Part II, paragraph 57, of the Verification Annex of the Convention requires that all samples requiring off-site analysis under the Convention shall be analyzed by at least two laboratories that have been designated as capable of conducting such testing by the Organization for the Prevention of Chemical Weapons (OPCW). The only United States laboratory currently designated by the OPCW is the United States Army Edgewood Forensic Science Laboratory.

In order to comply with the Chemical Weapons Convention, the certification submitted pursuant to condition (18) of the resolution of ratification of the Chemical Weapons Convention, and section 304 of the Chemical Weapons Convention Implementation Act of 1998 (22 U.S.C. 6724), the United States must possess, at a minimum, a second OPCW-designated laboratory. The possession of a second laboratory is especially necessary in view of the potential for a challenge inspection to be initiated against the United States by a foreign nation. To qualify as a designated laboratory, a laboratory must be certified under ISO Guide 25 or a higher standard, and complete three proficiency tests. The laboratory must have the full capability to handle substances listed on Schedule 1 of the Annex on Schedules of Chemicals of the Convention. In order to handle such substances in the United States, a laboratory also must operate under a bailment agreement with the United States Army.

Several existing United States commercial laboratories have approved quality control systems, already possess bailment agreements with the United States Army, and have the capabilities necessary to obtain OPCW designation. The Managers believe that, in order to safeguard samples taken on U.S. territory and bolster the legitimacy of the analysis of those samples, thereby protecting the proprietary and business interests of U.S. firms, and to promote similar transparency and confidence when inspections are conducted abroad, one of the United States designated laboratories should not be a U.S. Government facility.

This section therefore requires that the United States National Authority, by June 1, 2003, select a nongovernmental laboratory to pursue designation by the OPCW. A report is required by March 1, 2003, detailing a plan for securing OPCW designation of a third United States laboratory by December 1, 2004. With three designated U.S. laboratories, the OPCW could randomly send a real sample to two laboratories and a false sample to the third, so that a laboratory would never be sure what sample it was analyzing. This approach, which is in keeping with OPCW intent worldwide, would reduce significantly the value of any espionage information that a country or company might hope to gain by infiltrating a laboratory.

Title XVII—Authority to Transfer Naval Vessels

Sec. 1701. Authority to transfer naval vessels to certain foreign countries

This section authorizes the President to transfer vessels to foreign countries on a grant basis under section 516 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2321j) as follows:

(1) Poland.—To the Government of Poland, the Oliver Hazard Perry class guided missile frigate Wadsworth (FFG 9);

(2) Turkey.—To the Government of Turkey, the Knox class frigates Capodanno (FF 1093), Thomas C. Hart (FF 1092), Donald B. Beary (FF 1085), McCandless (FF 1084), Reasoner (FF 1063), and Bowen (FF 1079).

This section also authorizes the President to transfer vessels to foreign governments and foreign governmental entities on a sale basis under section 21 of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2761) as follows:

(1) Mexico.—To the Government of Mexico, the Newport class tank landing ship Frederick (LST 1184);

(2) Taiwan.—To the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office in the United States (which is the Taiwan instrumentality designated pursuant to section 10(a) of the Taiwan Relations Act), the Kidd class guided missile destroyers Kidd (DDG 993), Callaghan (DDG 994), Scott (DDG 995), and Chandler (DDG 996);

(3) Turkey.—To the Government of Turkey, the Oliver Hazard Perry class guided missile frigates Estocin (FFG 15) and Samuel Eliot Morison (FFG 13).

This section also states that the value of a vessel transferred to another country on a grant basis under section 516 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2321j) pursuant to authority provided by subsection (a) shall not be counted for the purposes of subsection (g) of that section in the aggregate value of excess defense articles transferred to countries under that section in any fiscal year.

This section states further that any expense incurred by the United States in connection with a transfer authorized by this section shall be charged to the recipient (notwithstanding section 516(e)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2321j(e)(1)) in the case of a transfer authorized to be made on a grant basis.

This section also directs that, for a vessel transferred on a grant basis to Turkey, the President may waive reimbursement of charges for the lease of that vessel under section 61(a) of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2796(a)) for a period of one year before the date of the transfer of that vessel.

This section also directs that, to the maximum extent practicable, the President shall require, as a condition of the transfer of a vessel under this section, that the country to which the vessel is transferred have such repair or refurbishment of the vessel as is needed, before the vessel joins the naval forces of that country, be performed at a shipyard located in the United States, including a United States Navy shipyard.

Finally, the authority to transfer a vessel under this section shall expire at the end of the two-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act.

SENATE—Monday, September 23, 2002

The Senate met at 2:30 p.m. and was called to order by the Honorable HARRY REID, a Senator from the State of Nevada.

PRAYER

Liberating Lord of all, we begin the work of this week remembering what took place 140 years ago yesterday on September 22, 1862. President Abraham Lincoln, a humble instrument in Your mighty hands, issued the life changing, values-reorienting, culture-reforming Emancipation Proclamation. The right to life, freedom, and citizenship was assured for all persons regardless of race, origin, or circumstance. This courageous position of valuing all human life by freeing the slaves was the direct result of biblical truth which could no longer be denied.

Now, 140 years later, we ask for Your strength to continue to overcome any vestiges or prejudice in our hearts. We still need Your emancipation from customs that constrict, practices that patronize, superiority that scrutinizes, and attitudes that anger. Keep us in the battle for equality in education, job opportunities, and social advancement for all Americans. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable HARRY REID led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

CHOOSING PRIORITIES

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I wish to take a few minutes to talk about where the Senate is and where the Senate is going. Obviously, we are coming to the end of the session. I presume the maximum we will be here is 2 weeks after this week, a total of 3 weeks, unless circumstances change.

We have, of course, as usual, a lot of legislation that could be done. There are a lot of issues about which we have talked this year that need to be finalized. All those issues rise to the top at the end of a session.

More importantly, we are faced with the fact that there is limited time, and the process takes a good deal of time. Therefore, it is necessary, it seems to me, for us to choose priorities and decide what we must complete before we go into recess for the election and after and, of course, do whatever we can but that those need to be our priorities.

I am one who believes strongly in the fact that one has to make priorities, in any group, although this group is not an easy one to manage. Decisions need to be made with respect to what we need to do and, frankly, finding some limits on how long we can spend on different issues.

We only have time for a relatively few items to be completed, in my opinion. Some of them are more fairly obvious and some are quite important. Obviously, we have to complete homeland security. We have been on that bill now, I believe, 3 weeks. Hopefully, we will finish it very soon. Because of the time, it needs to be completed soon.

Quite frankly, we find ourselves in a delay, a stalling arrangement here that is not where we need to be. Are there differences of views? Of course, and they need to be resolved, but that is what the system is about, and we need to go on.

We are going to be faced very soon with a resolution with respect to Iraq. In fact, we are working on it now. It is an issue that needs to be addressed and addressed quickly. Again, it will take a certain amount of time, but we do need to address it, and we need to address it on the basis that it is a priority with which we need to deal, however one feels about it.

Defense appropriations: We are going to find ourselves not having dealt with more than half the appropriations bills by the time we go into recess, but many of them can probably be tided over for several months with a continuing resolution, funding the agencies at the level they have been in the past year. It is not an unusual occurrence. But Defense appropriations, in this instance, is quite different because of the circumstances relating to terrorism.

Defense appropriations need to be completed. More resources obviously need to be available to our military so when we ask our military to do whatever we ask them to do, they have the best support we can possibly give to them.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

The CR needs to be dealt with so we do not have the Government being stopped because of no financing. Remember, we did that a number of years ago. We cannot let that happen, of course.

There are lots of issues people will talk about that indeed are important, and if we had our way, they could all be done. Unfortunately, a lot of those issues have not been brought out of committee and to the floor so we can move them forward. I believe 8 out of 13 appropriations bills have not been dealt with yet.

We are going to soon have to deal with a payback for Medicare. I find at home—and I am sure everyone else does, too—more physicians are not treating Medicare patients because the reimbursement has gone down, and it is scheduled to go down more the first of next month. Frankly, this would be a relatively easy issue to fix. We know what the percentages are, and we could do something about that.

An issue that I have talked a great deal about and that is more difficult—and I do not think we will accomplish but many of us would like to—is pharmaceuticals. We need to find a way to make pharmaceuticals more available to the elderly particularly. We have worked on that a great deal and have not come to a conclusion and will not, in my opinion, by the time this session is over.

We have spent a good deal of time on energy. Certainly, energy is an issue that affects not only the economy but it affects terrorism and the upheaval in the Middle East where we have let ourselves become 60 percent dependent on imported energy. We need to change that. We need to have a policy. We have not had a policy for some time. We are now in the process of developing that policy in a conference committee, and we need to get that finished.

We talked about drought relief. It is on the table. We can do that.

Unfortunately, we will probably not be able to deal with terrorism insurance, which is too bad. It is a good issue because it has to do with the economy. It has to do with the resistance to constructing buildings, for example, when you cannot have insurance for them.

There are lots of other issues, such as tort reform and health care costs. I think we have to move on those issues. We have to move ahead with the budget resolution, which we have not had for the first time in a number of years.

One may say, what is the difference? The difference is not only does it help us deal with what we are going to spend, but it has an operational aspect to it that says if you spend over what you have agreed to for the budget, there have to be 60 votes to pass it, which is the kind of resistance we need when we are spending too much money.

We have already talked about prescription drugs. That is an issue we really need to deal with. There are a number of ideas, and we need to consider them.

The permanent tax cut, of course, again, has to do with stimulating the economy, and we have talked about that a great deal as something we need to do.

There are also the issues of homeland security and welfare reform. Welfare reform is pretty much ready to go in the committee. We are going to have to have a temporary passage to keep that in place because it expires shortly. These are the things we need to deal with, as well as the appropriations bills.

I urge that we set some priorities, decide what it is we are going to do over this time, and set some time goals so we can work at it. Then I think we really have to enforce it.

Today, for example, it will be 5 o'clock on a Monday before we get around to voting, and I suspect we will be out again next Friday. The time has come when we really need to take the time that is available to do what we have to do. That is our challenge, and certainly it is not easy.

It is difficult because we all have different ideas about what issues are most important. We have some compelling issues that clearly need to be moved on because of the shortage of time. I urge we move that way and complete the work that is necessary for it to be done before we leave in October.

I yield the floor.

THINNING THE FORESTS

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, in the time I have this afternoon, I want to address three subjects. The first relates to an issue we are going to be taking up tonight, which is the cloture motion on an amendment relating to the Interior appropriations bill. The Domenici-Craig amendment dealing with forest health will go down if cloture is invoked. Therefore, I urge my colleagues not to vote to invoke cloture.

I also acknowledge that the efforts to try to reach a compromise on how to protect our forests from disease, infestation, poor health, and fire have not borne fruit, and it is unlikely there will be an agreement reached in a bipartisan way sufficient to allow us to pass something that will provide relief to those, particularly in the West, who have forests that need this kind of treatment. That being the case, we are going to have to find another way to deal with the issue.

The administration is committed to forest health. The President has laid out a plan, and I think administratively the Departments of the Interior and Agriculture will do the very best they can to work within the existing law to manage our forests to bring them back to health and to prevent fires.

The reality is that this failure to reach an agreement will have disastrous consequences, not just in terms of fire but the health of our forests, particularly in the West, and that is not a situation we should be very proud of in this body.

We tried very hard, particularly those of us who represent the Western States, to educate some of our colleagues about what we mean by forest management. There is not much debate in the scientific community about what ought to be done to our forests, maybe 75 million acres of trees. They need to be treated, and by that we mean there needs to be a process whereby the dead, dying, and diseased timber, as well as the very small diameter timber, is removed so the forest can sustain the larger trees we want to preserve and return forests to the healthy conditions they were in maybe about 100 years ago. This means opening up the canopies and providing more opportunity for grass. The trees that would be thinned would not only remove a source of competition to the larger trees in terms of soaking up the moisture and nutrients from the soil, but also providing fuel for forest fires which, instead of just creeping along the ground as they did 100 years or so ago, are now using these small trees to basically climb a ladder up to the crowns of the big trees.

What we see on television, when we see the pictures of these enormous forest fires, is the canopies of the big trees literally superheating and then exploding into flame, and this is what spreads the fire for miles and miles.

If the dead and dying fuel on the forest floor is removed, the down fuel as well as those small-diameter trees that are literally choking the forests to death right now, it is not only opened up for the trees and other flora and fauna that we want to grow properly but it also removes a significant fire danger. That is what the scientific community understands needs to be done.

The problem is that there are radical environmentalists who do not want to see this done. Ironically, our goal is the same: To protect those beautiful big trees and to create a healthy environment for all of the other flora and fauna. But they are so afraid that a timber industry will be either preserved or regenerated, and that that timber industry will soon set its sights on cutting the big trees as well, that they are really willing to cut off their nose to spite their face; that is to say, to risk the health of the entire forest in order that a timber industry is not encouraged to take hold.

In my State of Arizona, there is not any more timber industry, so we are not interested in bringing an industry back. It is gone. There are a couple of small mills that can take small-diameter timber and make 2 by 4's and fiberboard. The White Mountain Apache Indian Tribe has two small mills that can handle larger diameter timber which they cut on their reservation.

But this is not about creating a timber industry in Arizona. It is not about logging. We are not going to have logging as we used to know it. It is about companies being permitted to do the Government's work of cleaning out the forests and making a little bit of profit. They are not going to do it for free. We do not have enough money in the budget to pay the cost of doing that. They have to be willing to do it for the small amount of money they can make on the products they are now permitted to sell.

That is what this debate has been all about, and I am very discouraged that the radical environmental movement has such a stranglehold on some politicians that even though they will privately tell us they understand the scientists are right, that we do need to go in and manage our forests, they are not willing to confront these people in an open forum. It has been an interesting one-sided debate we have had in the Senate. No one has defended the other position. The reason is because it is indefensible. It boils down to a political issue. That is too bad for the forests.

I understand what happens when we are not able to reach agreement. We are not going to be able to get 60 votes to carry the day. As a result, we have to find another way to do this. Therefore, depending upon what the assistant majority leader and others decide to do at the end of the day, that issue may well be behind us as of tonight as something we will deal with in the Senate. That is too bad. We should have been able to deal with that.

I add a postscript before I turn to the next subject. Some on my side of the aisle have criticized the majority leader because he was able to secure in an appropriations bill special relief for his home State of South Dakota and the Black Hills by doing exactly what we are talking about, thinning those forests. He did that by, in effect, waiving all environmental considerations. In other words, the legislation provided the sufficiency for environmental achievement and nothing further was required to clean up these forests.

There was criticism. I suppose one could criticize the use of the process in the way that he did but frankly, I cannot criticize what he was attempting to achieve and what will be achieved as a result of his actions. The Black Hills are some of my favorite forests in this country. I used to vacation there as a young boy. I love the Black Hills. I am glad the majority leader saw fit to save the Black Hills. I wish we could apply something close to that same management technique for the rest of the country's forests. I find it ironic people would permit it to be done in this one area, which I support, but nowhere else.

I hope we can find a way to address this in the future, put the politics behind us, and get back to a scientific resolution of the issue.

IRAQ

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, the second subject I address is a resolution the White House has sent Congress for consideration of Presidential authority to deal with the problem of Iraq. There have been questions raised this weekend about the language of the resolution and the need, in some people's minds, to define it and provide greater definition.

My own view is the President and his administration did a very good job at crafting a resolution which will give the President the authority he needs to do the things we understand have to be done. I am a little worried about trying to be too cute in drafting language that will constrain the President in a variety of ways, not because we do not want to know what the President has in mind, but because we do not want to come back to the Congress every time the President needs some additional component of authority in fighting this war on terror.

The immediate need is to grant the authority to follow up on the resolutions that were violated by Saddam Hussein, and that if the United Nations is not going to take action, and it is not, then for the United States to be able to do that. We will pass that resolution by a fairly wide margin both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. I am hoping Members of this body will not view it necessary to draft the language in such a way that it puts the interests of the United States behind the authority of the United Nations.

The U.S. Government and those who represent the people of America will act on behalf of the security interests of the American people. That ought to be our first objective, not to try to resurrect the good reputation of the United Nations, not to put the U.S. position in a subservient role to the Security Council of the United Nations, and not to subject our decisionmaking or the President's authority to act to approval first of a body in the United Nations.

I therefore urge my colleagues not to succumb to the temptation of inserting language which would submit first to the United Nations and then the U.S. Congress.

It was my understanding—perhaps I should have asked unanimous consent before I began to speak—that I would be allotted 20 minutes, 10 minutes beyond the usual time.

Mr. REID. We have a limited amount of time. We have Democrats that need to speak.

I am sorry, but I have to object.

Mr. KYL. Might I then have 30 seconds to explain that I had been told that I would have 20 minutes, and I have calibrated my remarks to reflect that? I regret I will not be able to finish these remarks.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator. We on this side have speakers who wish to speak. If the entire allotted time is not used—I think it will be; we have our time allotted—perhaps the Senator wants to wait around to see if Democrats show up when they are supposed to.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair observes that the minority controls 8 minutes 16 seconds.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask that the Senator from New Mexico be allocated the 8 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may proceed.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, fellow Senators, I will not get a chance today to accomplish what I intend to accomplish. I assure those who are listening they will not have to wait long to get the rest of it because as we get time this week, we will start talking a little bit.

The majority side, led by the majority leader and the chairman of the Budget Committee, last week took to the floor one or two times with lengthy discussions about the American economy, with comments by each of them about who was to blame for the economic shortcomings that exist today.

I start with the economic downturn. Many Members and a few Americans remember the name Joseph Stiglitz. He was chairman of President Clinton's Council of Economic Advisers. He is quoted in the Atlantic Monthly, October 2002, page 77. He was known as an erudite and academically brilliant economist. He summarized when asked: When did the downturn start?

He said:

> The economy was slipping into recession even before Bush took office, and the corporate scandals that are rocking America began much earlier.

In this article he is explaining the American economy, which had been so buoyant for almost 10 years. We spoke of it from both sides of the aisle, with great admiration and fantastic respect for who did what, who did not do what, and why did this American economy grow.

He is suggesting the beginnings of the downward trends, in response to a question:

Not when he sent us a budget; not when he sent us a tax bill; not when he recommended we have tax cuts to perk this economy up; not when he recommended we spend more money to continue perking it up. Before those events occurred, the American economy was slipping into recession.

It is all right by this Senator that we come to the floor and state what we think. It is all right with me if we state them in political tones. It is all right with me if we state them with overtones that are patently political. It is someone's responsibility, when they think that is the case, to at least try to respond.

I will not be able, in the next 5 or 6 minutes, to respond to what probably was more than an hour last week by two or three on the other side, led by their leader, the majority leader, and the chairman of the Budget Committee, and what they had to say when they blamed the President of the United States for almost everything that is going wrong with the economy, in spite of many of them knowing that this is the fact, that this is the salient fact—that it all began long before that. We may be even fortunate that the economy, in its downward pressures, did not get worse. Perhaps it did not get worse because we did some things right under the leadership of the President and with Congress. Although it was difficult, hard work, we did follow most of his suggestions to try to get out from the slippage.

In less than a week we will enter the new fiscal year, the year of 2003. Let me repeat, in less than 1 week we will be entering the new Federal fiscal year, fiscal year 2003. As this new fiscal year approaches without us having enacted even one appropriations bill for next year, I have been struck by some of the statements being made on the floor—principally on that side of the aisle, and principally by leaders of the majority party.

Recently, the majority leader and the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee have taken to the floor to criticize the President's handling of the economy. I would like to be as honest as I can about this, so let's try to be honest as to what this is all about. This is politics, in my humble opinion, at its worst. Unwilling or afraid to face up to their own responsibilities, unable to defend their own record for failing to enact a budget in the Senate for the first time in the history of the Budget Act, they are now trying to confuse the public and somehow blame the President or the House of Representatives—which happens to be Republican by a few votes—for their failure. So now the time has come to play the blame game and to run away from whatever you have done and pin it on somebody else. That is this time of year.

This is important, and I would like the record to be clear. Back in May, the majority leader blamed the lack of a budget on an evenly divided membership in the Senate. Earlier this month, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Mr. McAuliffe, appearing on a Sunday morning show—I think it was "Face The Nation"—said: Don't blame us: . . . we need 60 votes for a budget.

Finally, last week the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, referring to an amendment that was voted in the Senate on June 20, clearly implying that it was a Senate budget, literally said here on the floor:

> . . . we got 59 votes for that proposal on a bipartisan basis. We needed a supermajority, which is 60.

Let me be as clear as I possibly can. We have not voted on a budget resolution in the Senate this year. We have not voted on a budget this year in the Senate. This will be the first time in the Budget Act's nearly 27-year history that the Senate has not adopted a budget blueprint. Say what you want about what it is or what it is not, we have always seen fit to adopt one. As tough as it was, as many hard votes as it took in the hours allotted under law, we always got one. We got one out of the committee when we were practically tied, for all intents and purposes. But no budget resolution has been brought to the floor of the Senate to be debated and voted on this year.

The chairman of the Budget Committee knows this. The majority leader knows this. To even hint that we have considered a budget is an absolute insult to those of us who worked to make this process a functional part of fiscal decisionmaking here in the Senate.

If my time is up, I yield the floor.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. REID. Mr. President, my friend, the senior Senator from New Mexico, has a chart. He talks about when the downtown started. The fact is, it is here. To try to divert attention from the problems of this country by trying to talk about when this problem started really doesn't do the trick. Presidents are blamed or given credit for what happens during their 4 years of office. That is the way it is, and that is the way it should be. The fact is, during this administration the economy has gone downhill every month the President has been in office.

To talk about when a problem started, we had problems during the 8 years that Clinton was President, but he was able to respond to make sure the country went on an upward path after that. The fact is, President Bush, no matter what he received when he was President, has done nothing to alleviate the problem. He has made it worse.

I would say to my friend from New Mexico, if he read the rest of Stiglitz's article, I find Stiglitz blames much, if not all, of the problems of this economy directly on the President, President Bush's economic policies. We just had Stiglitz appear before the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and he spent all afternoon telling us what was wrong with the Bush economic policies. Joseph Stiglitz has won a Nobel Prize in economics. He is one of the most renowned economists in the world. He places the blame at the foot of the President of the United States, President Bush, for the economy we now have.

There may have been some corporate problems that started many years ago. But, remember, this White House wanted to bring corporate America to the White House—and they did. There is no better example of that than the fact that when the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission was having his confirmation hearings, he said he wanted to bring a kinder more gentle SEC to America. That is what we have had at this White House. They simply have been kinder and gentler. They brought corporate America to the White House. The American people do not want that.

My friend also mentions in passing the United States of Representatives, which is controlled by the Republicans by just a few votes. Those of us who have served in the House of Representatives know the party that controls the House of Representatives controls the agenda over there. That is the way it works. It has always worked that way. One reason we have gotten nothing done in the Congress is because the Republican majority in the House of Representatives decided a long time ago they were not going to have anything happen this year. That is why we have every conference report stuck in a dark hole in the House of Representatives. They won't let us do anything on bankruptcy. They won't let us do anything on terrorism insurance. They won't let us do anything on election reform. They won't let us do anything on the Patients' Bill of Rights. They won't let us do anything on our generic drug bill, and on and on.

Whether it is 1 or 100 vote, it doesn't matter in the House of Representatives. It works like the parliamentary system. The party in power controls the agenda, and the House leadership has stated publicly that they are going to have nothing happen. They don't want their members to take tough votes, just like on the bankruptcy bill.

For the former chairman of the Budget Committee to come here and blame the problems on the budget—we don't have a budget because they won't let us have a budget—the fact is, the Appropriations Committee, under the leadership of Senator BYRD and Senator STEVENS, made sure that all appropriations bills were under the budget numbers, even though we didn't have budget numbers. The budget numbers are good numbers. They will not let us do the budget bills because of the same reason—the same reason. The House of Representatives has not moved appropriations bills.

You see, the Senate passed out of committee every appropriations bill. It has been done long since. But the House refuses to move on the bills. Therefore, we cannot do them. We are going to have a cloture vote on the Interior bill, which the Presiding Officer has worked on, not for hours, not days, but weeks, trying to come up with a compromise to meet the needs of the American public in the western part of the United States on firefighting but has been unable to work anything else. But that Interior appropriations bill is extremely important. It is not as if there is no money going to firefighting. There is 800 million extra dollars in this Interior bill to fight fires.

But they only want them to be fought—in the minds of the Republicans—the way they want to fight them. Do you know how they want to fight them? Take all environmental standards and go out and start chopping and burning anything in the forest that a lot of lumber companies want.

I say to my friend—he is my friend—the distinguished Senator from New Mexico that this won't sell. To come and say the problem started before President Bush became President is to blame it on somebody else. The President of the United States is stuck with an economic standard in this—his—administration, and for 2 years this economy has been going downhill, downhill, downhill. You can't blame it on September 11. The Afghanistan war caused about 25 percent of the problem. But all economists indicate that the other problem is right at the foot of this administration—whether it is tax policy or their other economic policies—which is responsible for 75 percent of our downturn.

We have all been affected. People in Nevada—in fact, people in every State in the Union—have been affected by the downturn in the economy. Many Nevadans, and people who live in all 50 States, have seen their retirement savings disappear in the wake of corporate crime, accounting abuses, and stock market declines.

The Las Vegas Review-Journal, the largest newspaper in Nevada, which has a circulation of a quarter million—to say it is conservative is a gross understatement; it is really conservative. It really focuses on government a lot. However, as conservative as that newspaper is, they wrote an editorial one day last week—in fact, the day after Senator DASCHLE gave a speech on the floor with the charts that he had—under the headline "Daschle is right." I thought they made a misprint when I picked up that newspaper. But they had not. They believe TOM DASCHLE is right.

This newspaper with a conservative bias, and which seldom has kind words for Democrats or the majority leader, said in this editorial that America needs a new economic direction and President Bush's policies have failed.

The Las Vegas Review-Journal said:

> The economy is showing an anemic 1 percent rate of growth, the majority leader charged. Under the Bush administration the Nation has lost 2 million jobs and $4.5 trillion in stock market value—much of it melting out of individual Americans' retirement acts. Foreclosures are up, and the government is once again spending Social Security surpluses to pay for other programs . . . it would be a mistake to dismiss the statistics he cites. They are real, as are the economic doldrums they describe.

They go on to say:

> President Bush has indeed failed to do all that he could and should have done to put America back on the path to vibrant economic growth, opportunity and prosperity.

That is about as direct as you can get.

It doesn't stop there. Robert Novak—I have great respect for Robert Novak. I consider him a friend. But I have to tell you that he has rarely said anything nice about me, and rarely has anything nice to say about Democrats. He is a very conservative political pundit, and he is a good one. I have appeared on his show on a number of occasions. He is hard, but he is fair. You always know where he is coming from. But rarely does he join with us in criticizing Republicans and what they are doing. But he did yesterday. I think it was yesterday. I read about it in the paper. It may have been Saturday. He said something very similar to what the Las Vegas Review-Journal said. But his column is printed all over America, and in the Washington Post, of course.

In this piece, under the headline "Avoidance Agenda"—and in other newspapers the same column had a different headline: "Winning Without a Vision"—in this piece, Novak takes Republicans to task for offering no domestic alternative to the "kitchen table" issues which Democrats are discussing and working on: Prescription drugs and other health benefits, corporate accountability, pension protection, Social Security.

According to Novak:

> Midsummer Democratic exuberance has vanished, and Republican anxiety has faded—thanks to Iraq's eclipsing economic issues six weeks before midterm elections. Yet, beneath the surface, thoughtful Republicans ask: What will it mean for the party to sneak by on November 5 without a vision and, indeed, without an agenda?
>
> George W. Bush is committed to being a war President, unwilling to use the bully pulpit to press domestic programs, especially without support from Congress.

He continues:

> The crowding out of corporate corruption by war against Iraq unquestionably has brightened Republican prospects for winning both houses of Congress, saving President Bush from electoral disasters frequently visited on new presidents at midterm. However, apart from the war on terrorism, the Republican Party flinches from standing for much of anything in the 2002 election.
>
> The problem is that Republicans—including Bush himself—do not pursue a domestic alternative.
>
> This is a matter of concern for the future and perhaps even for this election among a variety of wise old heads in the GOP. One early GWB-for-president backer voiced displeasure with Bush's handling of an economy in which corporate profits are low, investor confidence has been shattered and consumer confidence is in jeopardy. "He does not seem worried enough about the economy, does not express himself forcefully enough." The president does not share his father's boredom with domestic affairs, but there is no doubt he sees his destiny as winning the war against terrorism and not as reformer of the tax system.
>
> There are officials inside the administration who signal their concern by suggesting it is necessary to come up with new domestic initiatives.
>
> Bush and the Republican Party actually risk a lot tying themselves to the limited goal of maintaining a House majority. By accepting the caution urged on him by Capitol Hill, the president abdicates a vital responsibility of the president as a party leader. Any new initiatives await passage of an Iraq resolution or perhaps even congressional adjournment, leaving a Republican voice that is muted on everything but Iraq.

I started saying a couple of weeks ago, as others have said, that this country is a big country; we can have a big political agenda. We can focus on Iraq, as we should, but we can focus on other things. The administration is focusing only on Iraq. Let us talk about the other issues. Let us talk about the stumbling, faltering economy, which we must address.

If you were planning on retiring, Mr. President, this year, you would have to wait, on average, 7 years before you could retire. You would have to work an extra 7 years because you have lost that much—mostly in the stock market. People who were going to retire can't retire. If you started out with $100 in savings, you now have about $65 in savings. That is it. You multiply that, and you will see what it does to somebody who is building for retirement.

The Las Vegas Review-Journal has not changed its political philosophy; they have had the same political philosophy for decades. Also, I would say that Robert Novak hasn't changed; he has had the same political philosophy for 30 or 40 years.

The Republicans' proposed solution to economic woes plaguing Nevada and the entire country are far different from those favored not only by Senate Democrats. I also not only speak for Senate Democrats but I speak for mainstream Nevadans and Americans.

I have no doubt that Republicans will continue to criticize and even mislead readers about our policies, and that is too bad. To come here today and to say the problems of this country are the result of something that started a long time ago is ridiculous. I have no doubt we must continue to address the problems that face this country, and we must continue to address them focusing on more than Iraq. This country has more ability to do that.

I am very disappointed that my friend, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, would come here and cite Joseph Stiglitz as supporting the policy of this country going back to the last administration when, in fact, if you read anything that Stiglitz writes, he talks about the economy being bad as a result of what happened with this administration's economic policy.

TRIBUTE TO GREG MADDUX

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding Nevadan, Greg Maddux.

Greg Maddux is a baseball player. That is a tremendous understatement. He is one of best pitchers in professional baseball today and considered among the best to ever play the game.

For those who do not follow baseball or are not aware of the significance of this accomplishment, let me explain that Cy Young was one of baseball's first superstars. He pitched about a hundred years ago, starting in 1890 and finishing his career in 1911. Cy Young set many records that last to this day and will likely never be broken. He became the standard by which all pitchers who followed, even now about a century after him, are judged. In fact, the honor bestowed each year on the best pitcher in each league is known as the Cy Young award.

Greg was born on April 14, 1966, the youngest of three children born to parents Dave and Linda Maddux. Dave was in the Air Force so the family including Greg's brother Mike and sister Terri moved around a lot but eventually settled in Las Vegas.

At Valley High in Las Vegas, Greg Maddux earned All-State honors in baseball his junior and senior years. He was selected by the Chicago Cubs in the second round of the free agent draft while he was still in high school, and following his graduation in 1984, he joined their minor league system. He made quick progress in the minors, earing a call up to the big leagues in 1986 at age 20, becoming the youngest Cub in the majors since 1967. He won his first start on September 7 of that year with a complete game victory against the Cincinnati Reds, who were his favorite team as a youth. And later that month he won his second game when he beat his brother Mike, himself a successful professional player who pitched for 15 years in the major leagues. In fact, Mike pitched for 10 major league teams over 15 years. But for his brother, Greg, he would be Las Vegas's most famous major league pitcher.

You can imagine how proud the Maddux family must have been to see these 2 brothers competing against each other as they had years earlier when they played whiffle ball games in the backyard, and the satisfaction Greg took in overcoming his big brother.

Greg started playing catch with his dad when he was just 2 years old and made enough progress that several years later he skipped tee ball and started playing peewee ball against boys much older and bigger than him.

Although he was the smallest and youngest kid on the team, Greg became the starting pitcher and the best player on the team, and his father—who coached the team—already saw signs that Greg was destined to be a star.

The Maddux family had a passion for sports, and the children learned the key to success was effort.

"I think our household was like every other American household," says Greg's mother, Linda. "It was routine. They had school, homework, baseball practice, and chores around the house."

One of the values that David and Linda Maddux tried to instill in Greg and his two siblings was a "good work ethic."

"Each one had his jobs around the house," she says, "and they did them without question."

That hard work clearly has paid off throughout Greg Maddux's career, helping make him the winningest pitcher of the 1990s.

He is not physically imposing—he stands less than 6 feet tall and weighs perhaps 175 pounds. He doesn't overpower but baffles batters with his pinpoint control and mastery. A maxim normally applied to real estate could also describe the keys to Greg Maddux's successful pitching: location, location, location.

He works efficiently, using economy of pitches. In yesterday's record-setting victory 61 of his 76 pitches were strikes. And last year he averaged only 1 walk per 9 innings.

As different as it is to draw a walk from him Greg is also stingy in giving up runs.

He concluded the 1990s with a 2.54 ERA over the decade, the third lowest ERA for any decade since 1910, behind only Hoyt Wilhelm (2.16) and Sandy Koufax (2.36) in the 1960s. In 1995, he became the first pitcher to log back to back seasons with an ERA under 1.80.

His main pitches include a fastball in the mid-80s, a curve ball, slider and changeup. But whatever he throws, he regards his favorite pitch as strike three.

Teammate John Smoltz, also a Cy Young winning pitcher says of Greg, "Every pitch has a purpose. Sometimes he knows what he's going to throw two pitches ahead. I swear, he makes it look like guys are swinging foam bats against him."

And an opposing team's scout remarks, "Maddux is so good, we all should be wearing tuxedos when he pitches."

Greg Maddux has been described as a scientist who dissects opposing teams, an artist who paints the corners of home plate and a magician who can perform wonders with a baseball and make a talented batter disappear.

Sports Illustrated hailed him as the "best pitcher you'll ever see."

When he takes the mound, he presents a clinic, masterfully working the plate and using his arsenal of pitches. With guile, cunning and a poker face, he outsmarts opponents and keeps them guessing. It has been said that he can throw any pitch anywhere he wants on any count. As a result, batters are seldom able to hit the ball solidly and are often off balance, resulting in a harmless grounder or fly ball.

Not only is Greg Maddux an outstanding pitcher, but an all around baseball player, as he can field, hit and run the bases very well. He holds numerous records for putouts, assists and double plays, and is considered one of the best-fielding pitchers of all time. He has won 12 consecutive Gold Glove Awards for his fielding and is likely on his way to yet another.

As I said he works hard on his batting, normally not something pitchers are known for. In 1999, he hit 2 home runs and averaged .264.

His calm demeanor and humility mask a fierce determination and competitive spirit that have earned him the nickname "Mad Dog."

Greg has been one of the major reasons the Atlanta Braves have been able to win their division an unprecedented 12 years in a row and again this year have the best record in the league.

He wears number 31, but since joining the Braves as a free agent in 1993, he has been the number 1 pitcher on a team that includes 2 other Cy Young winners, Smoltz and Glavine.

Yet Greg is a modest man who downplays his achievement.

"I never really thought about it," Maddux said of the record he set yesterday. "It feels good to be healthy enough to get it." He praises his teammates for much of his success and cites winning the World Series with the Braves in 1995, not any individual achievement, as his greatest and proudest moment in sports.

Watching Greg Maddux on the mound, Braves pitching coach Leo Mazzone says he is well aware that he is seeing a future Hall of Famer. For winning the Cy Young, his glove and spikes are already in the Hall, and Greg Maddux certainly will be voted in as soon as he is eligible, five years after he retires.

As much of a success and a role model as Greg Maddux is on the baseball field, he is also a success and role model in life.

He is a devoted family man, married to a wonderful wife Kathy. They have a daughter, Amanda Paige and a son Chase Alan.

Greg can afford to live anywhere. I know that we are happy that he and his family have chosen to live in Las Vegas and to contribute generously to others in the community, whether signing autographs for fans or giving his time and money towards charitable causes.

Greg states that he has no use for the glamorous life which his money could buy and describes himself as "your average Joe."

Kathy and Greg lead the Maddux Foundation, which is involved in several charitable activities in Las Vegas and Atlanta. The Foundation supports children's homes, domestic crisis shelters, and boys' and girls' clubs.

"Our foundation is low key," Maddux said. "We've never really solicited anyone outside before."

"The goal is to give more money to charity. It's about 'How much can we give?' instead of 'How much can we profit?' "

In recent years, the Madduxes have expanded their philanthropic efforts, and brother Mike also has a foundation that helps children. Greg participates in golf tournaments whose proceeds go to the Southern Nevada chapter of the Candlelighters, which works with families whose children are battling cancer, and Safe Nest, which helps victims of domestic violence.

To my friend, Greg Maddux, a great baseball player and great American I want to thank you for all you have done for Las Vegas and for Nevada, and as a role model for all America. You are a breath of fresh air in a troubled world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be recognized in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IRAQ AND THE ECONOMY

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I spent the weekend in my home State of Illinois, from the southern part of the State, the metro east, St. Clair County, Madison County, and the city of Chicago, going from one place to another, and it is interesting to me that people will stop and ask me about our going to war in Iraq.

I have not found a single person who makes any excuses for Saddam Hussein. I will not. He is a man who certainly distinguished himself—if that is the word—in the history of this world: for his aggression, his militarism, his inhumane treatment of his own people and his neighbors.

He is someone who cannot be trusted but must be watched carefully and closely. He is someone who must be monitored at all times for fear he could go too far in his development of weapons and his development of military strategies as a threat to the world. Everyone concedes this. I certainly concede it.

We found what he was all about when he invaded Kuwait. We have watched him closely ever since. The United Nations put restrictions on what he can do in defense of his own nation, limitations on his own military power. One of those limitations prohibits weapons of mass destruction: chemical weapons, biological weapons, and nuclear weapons.

The United Nations started inspecting for those weapons after the Persian Gulf war. Saddam Hussein threw every obstacle he could find in their path. He discouraged them when he could, and ultimately the inspections were withdrawn 4 or 5 years ago. We still do a flyover with our planes to watch everything that happens in his country, not to mention all the other sources of intelligence. We worry about him, as we should.

Having said all those things, and the fact that almost everyone acknowledges them to be true, it is still interesting, as I go around my State—a State which is fairly diverse in terms of its economy, in terms of its culture, in terms of its politics—there is no ground swell for America to invade Iraq and to displace Saddam Hussein from power.

The idea of a land invasion, for what the President calls a "regime change" has not brought the people out cheering, as they cheered after September 11 when we said we were going after Osama bin Laden and al-Qaida. Instead, what I hear from the people I speak to in Illinois is that certainly we have to keep an eye on this man, but why should we do it alone? Shouldn't the United States have standing with it a coalition of countries around the world? Why would we do this by ourselves? Isn't it better to invite other nations to be part of it because there is strength in numbers, more clarity of purpose, a sharing of the burden not only of the war but of controlling Iraq after it is defeated?

I can tell you that Thomas Friedman, the foreign Times correspondent for the New York Times, said it best. He said: Our situation in Iraq, if we go it alone, is much the same as the person who walks into the store and sees a sign which says, "If you break it, you own it."

If we displace Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq, then, frankly, as those who displaced him, we will have a burden to bring some stability and security to that country. Is it not better for us, in that circumstance, to have other Western civilized democratic nations standing behind us, not only behind the muzzle of the gun pointed at him but standing in league with us to make sure Iraq is peaceful and safe for a long time?

Let me add one other element that comes up time and again. This is a different world since September 11 of last year. We have to measure our foreign policy against its impact on terrorism. There is not a country in the world which would knowingly attack the United States. We have the best military in the world, the best men and women in uniform, the best technology, but we know we are vulnerable, we are vulnerable to terrorism.

If we make that decision to go it alone in Iraq, to do it by ourselves, and say to the rest of the world, we don't care what the opinion of the United Nations is or any other country is, we will go it alone, would that not invite a backlash from parts of the world that are preaching extremism and fundamentalism? Wouldn't that, unfortunately, sow the seeds of terrorism?

Isn't it far better for us to have a coalition with Arab States, as President Bush's father did in the Persian Gulf, a grand coalition of countries that say Saddam Hussein has to be watched carefully?

When I saw the resolution that President Bush sent us last week, that is not his intension, that is not his design. If you think that trip to the United Nations was an appeal to that body to move forward and do things, it might have been, but, frankly, his resolution he sent to us basically says: Ignore my speech; ignore my visit to the United Nations; ignore the United Nations; give me the authority to do it by myself.

I have no doubt we could win that war, that we could displace Saddam Hussein, but isn't there a better and more cautious and more prudent and more successful strategy we should consider—bringing in the United Nations for real inspections, unconditional inspections, enforced with military force, if they must be, including some troops from the United States, to make sure the inspectors get into the places they need to; and failing that, if Saddam Hussein stops the inspectors, that we issue an ultimatum to him through the United Nations, that if you do not allow unconditional inspections, you can expect there will be a forceful effort by the countries of the world to enforce United Nations resolutions already in place? Isn't that a far better approach than to say, we have a battle plan; we are going to attack; we will send you a note, United Nations, and let you know what happens?

The United Nations should not dictate American policy, but President Bush's father was right. When you can involve a coalition of nations around the world in your effort to bring peace to a region, you have a far greater chance of success, world acceptance, sharing the burden; and, ultimately, the American people would not stand by themselves but stand in concert with those of like mind and like values.

As I return to Illinois, people tell me over and over again: Senator, when you go back, please go to the floor of the Senate and express our feelings that we do need a coalition of force, not just for the principle and value of it but for the military significance of it, not just so we are not standing alone but so we are validated in the eyes of the world that what we are standing for is not just a narrow interest of the United States but in the best interest of a free and peaceful world.

That is what makes sense. That is what we ought to move forward with.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DURBIN. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. REID. I ask my friend from Illinois, is it true, when you returned to Illinois, people were asking about things other than Iraq?

Mr. DURBIN. Exactly true.

Mr. REID. Are people concerned about the stumbling, staggering, faltering economy?

Mr. DURBIN. I say to the Senator from Nevada, that is where I was headed next.

This chart, which I have brought to the floor, talks about the lost private sector jobs in the last 50 years. Look at what has occurred under President Eisenhower through George W. Bush. Look at the only period that shows red ink, the net loss of jobs; and it turns out to be under President Bush.

The people of Illinois talk about Iraq because it is in the headlines. That is all the media talks about. But when it comes to the issues they worry about, this is what they are concerned about. There are not enough jobs, not enough good-paying jobs.

Unfortunately, under this administration, the economy is not even a major issue. They are ignoring it. I asked last week—and I will renew my request to the President—can you give us 1 hour a week on America's economy, 1 hour to talk about income and job security? That is a valid issue.

Take a look at long-term unemployment. It has more than doubled under President Bush. In January 2001, when he came to office, there were 648,000 under long-term unemployment, people unemployed for half a year. That number has more than doubled in this period of time. The President may rally America to stand behind him, as he should, on the war on terrorism and foreign policy. But he ought to rally America to work, give people opportunities so they can be employed, so they have some opportunity to enjoy the benefits of this country.

We are facing now the weakest economic growth in 50 years. This chart shows economic growth, the average rate of growth over the last 2 years. Under President George W. Bush, it has been 1.0 percent. The next worst President, since Eisenhower, was his father. Then you have to go back to Gerald Ford to find another bad period of time.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business has expired.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I don't see anyone here wishing to speak. It is my understanding morning business has, under the previous order, ended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. REID. The next period of time is for debate on the cloture motion; is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate is to resume consideration of H.R. 5093.

Mr. REID. So is it now time to debate the Dodd amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, to discuss the Dodd amendment.

Mr. REID. I don't see anyone here, so I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois be recognized for 10 minutes and that the Republicans be given an extra 10 minutes also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. President, I will yield at least a portion of my time to my friend from North Dakota.

Look at the rate of growth under the Bush Presidency. Is it any wonder the President does not want to talk about the economy?

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DURBIN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. REID. I should have included that this time comes from the debate on the Dodd amendment, that that number be lessened by 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DURBIN. If you have the weakest economic growth in 50 years, there is no reason for you to talk about it. Certainly this Bush White House will not. They won't bring this issue to the American people because they don't have much to tell us.

The news we have seen on the economy is well known. Take a look at what has happened in terms of the market value of those who own stocks, the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq, $4.5 trillion of lost stock market wealth between January 2001, when President Bush came to office, and August 2002. That, of course, represents not just a loss in stock market wealth, it is a loss of savings. It is a loss of college savings accounts for kids. It is a loss of pension plans, 401(k)s, and people making new plans with their lives because of the bottom falling out of the stock market.

Of course, last week we saw the Dow Jones crashing even further. The people in the Bush administration do not want to discuss this. They don't want to talk about turning this economy around. They want to talk about rallying troops.

Let's rally the American people to get the economy back on its feet. Let the President give us 1 hour a week talking about what we can do to try to get this economy moving forward again.

This stock market decline is a new record. If you look at the sharpest percentage decline in the Standard & Poor's 500, only Herbert Hoover has a worse record than President George W. Bush. Herbert Hoover in the Great Depression saw the stock market decline by 30 percent. So far, under President George W. Bush we have seen a decline of 21 percent—historic declines. It is no wonder the President does not want to discuss this.

Look as well at what workers are facing who still are on the job. The cost of health insurance has inflated dramatically since the President came to office: family coverage, 16 percent; individual coverage, 27 percent.

The biggest single complaint I have heard from businesses, labor unions, and individuals in the State of Illinois: the cost of health insurance. Senator, what are you going to do about it? The honest answer is that this Congress has done nothing about it, nor has the President proposed anything significant.

When we consider the issues we should be about, national security is No. 1, I agree, but it is not the only issue facing America. We need to discuss issues of pension security and income security and health care security and the future of Social Security. Those are issues American families worry about every single day. We in the Senate should worry about them as well.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I have been listening to the Senator from Illinois. He is right. Iraq is not an irrelevant issue. It is a very important issue. The President will find, as we finish all of these discussions, that we will have a pretty unified voice on what we do around the world, but we need to do that through the United Nations, with other partner countries, as part of a coalition. At the end of the day, this country will have led the way towards that result.

It is also the case, when most people sit down around the supper table and talk about their lives, they are talking about subjects that are much different from Iraq. They are discussing issues such as: Do we have a good job; does it pay well; do we have job security; do we send our kids to good schools; do grandpa and grandma have decent health care; do we live in a safe neighborhood? All of those issues exist as well.

There are some who don't want to talk about any of those issues. They say: These issues somehow are irrelevant.

They are not irrelevant to people out of work, who are concerned about their jobs, concerned about opportunities for themselves and their children, concerned about the ability to buy health care, to pay for health insurance, to afford their prescription medicine. The Senator is absolutely correct. There are a lot of other issues we must resolve.

This Senate is at parade rest; I am guessing because there are some people here who don't want us to do anything on these issues, whether it is health care, the economy, or corporate scandals. And incidentally, I won't have time to talk much about that, but we have not finished on that issue, the issue of corporate scandals. We are talking about hundreds of millions and billions of dollars frittered away by CEOs and others who have run corporations into the ground.

A recent study by the Financial Times says that of the 25 largest bankruptcies in America, prior to bankruptcy 208, executives took $3.3 billion out of the companies prior to running them into the ground. Should we do something about that? We should. That issue isn't over, despite the fact there are some in this Chamber and downtown who resist every step of the way.

We have a lot to do. There is a lot on the agenda, a lot on our plate. Frankly, there are some people who are sitting here with their feet on the brakes. They don't want anything to happen on issues that matter a great deal to the average American family.

I have listened attentively to the presentation. I was going to come over and make a presentation myself. I will do that tomorrow.

The answer is, yes, let's be very concerned about Iraq, about foreign policy, about the war on terrorism. Let's be concerned about it, do it seriously. But let's also understand it is not the only subject. There are other important considerations impacting on the lives of American families with which we need to be dealing.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the Senator from North Dakota. Average families have to worry about a lot of issues: the health of their children, whether they can make the mortgage payment. If families can face more than one responsibility, our Government certainly can.

It is not enough to say we are just going to focus on the Middle East and what might happen there in the years to come; let's talk about what is happening in the middle west and the East and the South and the North, all across the United States. What are we doing to make sure this economy turns around and gives people a chance?

I spoke to a friend of mine in the plumbers union in Chicago who told me that the cost of prescription drugs for retirees last year went up 300 percent in his one local. He said: I don't know if we can meet our obligation to our seniors that we promised over the years.

As for corporate greed and scandals, the Senator from North Dakota talks about the bankruptcies and the money squandered before bankruptcy. There is a company called Tyco where the CEO, Mr. Kozlowski, has been written up in the Wall Street Journal. Their company didn't go into bankruptcy. It is still in business. But what he did to it was to bleed it of a lot of money, hundreds of millions of dollars in the years leading up to his resignation.

All of these things have discredited American business. They have discredited the good, honest businesspeople who lead our Nation effectively. Frankly, they have put a damper on America's feelings about buying stock. The President needs to address this.

We passed the Sarbanes bill. It was a good bill. I was glad to vote for it. There is more to do: the bankruptcy code, that corporate bankruptcy will take into account when people have squandered the money of corporations so that it comes back into the corporation and away from these corporate executives; that they be charged with crimes when they are guilty. All of these issues need to be taken up. It is an agenda which we should face because it is an agenda the American people face every single day. And unless and until we do that, we are not meeting our obligation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I see the Senator from Colorado here. Under the order entered, it is my understanding that Senators CAMPBELL and INOUYE have equal time with Senator DODD. Is that the understanding?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. REID. The order said Senator CAMPBELL had 20 minutes, Senator DODD had 20, and Senator INOUYE had 20. Is that all right with the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. REID. When we started this debate, we gave 10 minutes to the Democrats and 10 minutes to the Republicans, leaving 20 minutes on each side. Senator INOUYE said that would be OK with him. If we need more time—

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think 10 will be enough. Perhaps I can ask unanimous consent if it is not; that is, 10 minutes for Senator INOUYE and 10 for me?

Mr. REID. Yes. Why don't we do this. There is no one here to use the Republicans' morning business time. Why don't we give you back, so you have enough time, 25 minutes, and let's make sure Senator DODD has that. So I think that will extend the vote 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is fine. Has Senator DODD spoken yet?

Mr. REID. No, he has not. The vote would take place at 5:40, and Senator DODD will have 25 minutes and Senators CAMPBELL and INOUYE would have 25 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the leader, has Senator INOUYE been here yet?

Mr. REID. Yes.

Mr. DODD. This debate would end at 4:30; is that right?

Mr. REID. Yes. But the Republicans are entitled to 10 minutes in morning business. They may use that.

Mr. DODD. Does this require a unanimous consent request?

Mr. REID. Yes, Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 2003

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 5093, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5093) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 2003, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Byrd Amendment No. 4472, in the nature of a substitute.

Byrd Amendment No. 4480 (to Amendment No. 4472), to provide funds to repay accounts from which funds were borrowed for emergency wildfire suppression.

Craig/Domenici Amendment No. 4518 (to Amendment No. 4480), to reduce hazardous fuels on our national forests.

Dodd Amendment No. 4522 (to Amendment No. 4472), to prohibit the expenditure of funds to recognize Indian tribes and tribal nations until the date of implementation of certain administrative procedures.

Byrd/Stevens Amendment No. 4532 (to Amendment No. 4472), to provide for critical emergency supplemental appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be debate on the Dodd amendment No. 4522 until 4:40, equally divided between Senators DODD, INOUYE, and CAMPBELL, or their designees.

The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the amendment is offered on behalf of myself and Senator LIEBERMAN. I presume he will be coming to the floor at some point. He has a strong interest in the amendment. I want to be notified by the Chair when I have consumed 10 minutes, so I can leave time for Senator LIEBERMAN.

I begin by thanking my colleagues from Hawaii and Colorado. They were very generous—they are all the time, but particularly last week—in conducting a hearing on the subject matter that is the subject of this amendment. They graciously listened to a series of witnesses from the administration, from Connecticut, mayors from towns in Connecticut, along with other interested parties on the subject matter generally of the recognition process at the Bureau of Indian Affairs. So any discussion of the matter before us should begin with an expression of gratitude to both of these distinguished Members of the Senate for their willingness to listen to the case we presented.

Again, I express my gratitude to them. They are friends of mine, and this is one of those awkward moments that can happen when good friends find themselves on opposite sides of an issue.

Secondly, I had a good meeting last week with some of the national representatives of the Native American community from Indian country here in the Senate. I did state to them, which I will state here as well, that I take great pride in the relationship I have with my Indian constituents in Connecticut, as I have had around the country—on numerous occasions, whether appearing in Window Rock, AZ, or with the Gila River tribes, and others; with my good friend from Alaska, and others; I take a great deal of pride in my strong support for the Native American community.

What brings us here, and what Senator LIEBERMAN and I are raising, is the concern that we have over the present recognition process. It is a concern that was not generated by my State alone. It was, in fact, generated by a study done by the Government Accounting Office, backed by representatives of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. In 2000, the Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs stated before the U.S. Congress that the system was terribly broken and in need of repair. I don't know of anyone who disagrees with that.

Now, there are suggestions on how best to repair this. The problem is that while we are waiting for the repairs to occur, recognitions are going forward. In many cases, of course, they will be proven to be absolutely well-deserved, but others may not be. My concern is when that happens, it not only does damage to the communities and others who may be adversely affected by those decisions, but I argue just as strongly that an adverse impact occurs as well on existing tribal nations that have long sought recognition, and suspicions are raised about the validity and credibility of the process. Those who have received recognition I think are devalued as well. There are now pending 222 recognition petitions before the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

I have put up a chart showing where they are in the country. Many States, of course, have none; 37 States have at least 1 pending. In my State there are 12. Understand the size of my State. It is about 110 miles by 50 miles. There are national parks in this country that are larger geographically than my State. Some counties in various States are larger than Connecticut. So when you start talking about 12 petitions pending, you can begin to understand what the impact can be, particularly if there are concerns about the validity of some of the petitions pending. Massachusetts has 6, Rhode Island has 5, California has 53, North Carolina has 16, South Carolina has 11, Michigan has 10, Louisiana has 10, Missouri has 9, and so forth.

My colleagues are more than welcome to look at the list I have. There is a particular poignancy in Connecticut because of the number. Every single petition may be entirely meritorious. I would not, for one, suggest that they should not be approved if, in fact, that is the case. But, if you will, what provoked this particular concern to raise this amendment was a decision reached only a few weeks ago where two petitioning parties in Connecticut were each denied separate recognition. But the Bureau of Indian Affairs, contrary to the recommendation of the technical staff, recognized, in effect, a third tribe, and said both of these tribes are not two separate tribes, but one.

That may be a very legitimate conclusion, but you can understand the concern when all of a sudden, without any hearings, they arrived at a third conclusion, and the Assistant Secretary found that to be the result. So that raises concerns, obviously, in the minds of many people. Imagine two people seeking grant applications, both applications are rejected, and the Secretary of some agency construed a third grant application. It seems to me that goes beyond any parameters that Congress has extended to the Bureau of Indian Affairs in this kind of a process.

As I mentioned earlier, we have already seen statements from the Assistant Secretary of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. I quote him:

> I am troubled by the money backing certain petitions, and I do think it is time that Congress should consider an alternative to the existing process. Otherwise, we are more likely to recognize someone that might not deserve it.
>
> The more contentious and nasty things become, the less we feel we are able to do it. I know it is unusual for an agency to give up a responsibility like this, but this one has outgrown us. It needs more expertise and resources than we have available.

Mr. President, we could not agree more. I am not suggesting with this amendment, by the way, that any of the applications should be rejected. This bill would involve a 1-year moratorium to put the brakes on in order to put in place a recognition process that is predictable, credible, that would allow people to have an opportunity to respond, if you will.

I don't believe a year is asking too much. I know there are tribes that have been waiting decades, in some cases, for recognition. I feel as strongly about what has happened to them as I do in areas where recognition may be extended where it may not be warranted. The process is broken if you have to wait 25 years to be heard. That itself makes the case. That argues for the amendment and not against it.

So we feel strongly this amendment is not an egregious reach of authority.

Many people all the time ask us for support on various matters. I have certainly cast many votes where parts of the country have been affected by drought or other natural disasters. This is not a natural disaster. It is not even a disaster. It does not rise to that level, but my colleagues ought to understand when we have this kind of pressure occurring in a relatively small piece of geography where concerns are being raised despite recommendations of a technical staff and other recommendations, one can understand the urgency. I think any Senator representing his or her State faced with this kind of issue would take a similar position.

It is with a sense of regret that we have moved forward. I wish we had more time to wait and that another year or two would be adequate. But in the next year or two, we are going to find a lot of these recognition petitions to have been ruled upon. They may be ruled invalid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 10 minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I will let my colleagues proceed and share a few thoughts. The General Accounting Office is the last point I will make. In their study released last November, they were highly critical of the BIA. They did not just speak about Connecticut. They talked about the country. They said the Assistant Secretary has rejected several recent recommendations made by the technical staff, all resulting in either proposed or final decisions to recognize tribes when staff recommended against recognition.

I am not suggesting staff is always right in these matters or suggesting they are right and the Assistant Secretary is wrong. However, it seems to me it ought to be a source of some trouble when we have that kind of conflict of opinions occurring. Especially with 222 petitions pending, with criteria being used selectively, I think it is dangerous and could provoke a lot of hostility which we ought to avoid.

I urge the amendment be adopted, and I withhold the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President, first, I thank Senator DODD and Senator LIEBERMAN. I know, probably better than most in this Chamber, the exemplary voting record they have had and the strong voice they have been in supporting American Indians nationwide, people who very often are left out and do not have a very strong voice in the Congress. They do not have all the lobbyists that many groups have. They do not have the input that many other groups have. I know both these Senators have done a great job for them.

In this particular case, my friend and colleague, Senator INOUYE, the chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee, is going to move to table the amendment offered by Senators DODD and LIEBERMAN. I reluctantly say it is the right thing to do for our colleagues to vote to table.

During the time we have been considering the fiscal year 2003 Interior appropriations bill and Senator DODD's amendment, the Committee on Indian Affairs has held a hearing on two bills to address the Federal acknowledgment process introduced by both of these great Senators.

I know of no one who has said the Bureau of Indian Affairs is doing everything right, and we constantly review the actions of the Bureau in our committee.

I believe the process that governs how the United States recognizes Indian tribes should be transparent, timely, and afford due process to petitioners. I also believe fundamental fairness requires that truly affected communities be given an opportunity to be heard because, particularly with the advent of gaming, there are many things that happen when the tribes get the opportunity to game that sometimes local communities believe they are left out in the hearing process.

Of all affected communities, I believe the United States owes a moral debt to the Native American communities to ensure they receive every measure of fairness we can provide. That, in fact, is the core tenet of trust responsibility as set up originally in our Federal Government.

The hearing our committee held on September 17 has been very helpful in understanding the effects of this amendment since it contains several of the primary features of Senator DODD's bill, S. 1392. Very important, in my view, was a statement by the administration before our committee that it was opposed to S. 1392 and opposed to this amendment, too.

Primary among the administration's objections is that the legislation and the amendment would:

One, authorize "interested parties" to request that the Secretary conduct formal hearings on a petition, in addition to the formal on-the-record administrative factfinding proceeding, and the extensive administrative hearings and appeals that are currently available. They are already available. "Interested parties" is somewhat vague.

Two, alter the standard of proof from a "reasonable likelihood" standard to a "more likely than not" standard.

And, three, create conflict and confusion with the regulatory process by statutorily duplicating some regulations but not others, thereby inserting uncertainty as to which regulatory provisions are applicable.

Additionally, the administration informed the committee that it cannot support a moratorium on an already lengthy, burdensome, and slow process. Senator DODD spoke to that. In fact, they did testify that if either the Dodd bill or the Dodd amendment passed, it would take over a year to promulgate new rules to implement either one, the bill or the rule.

I believe the imposition of such a moratorium would be particularly onerous on those petitioning groups that have gone through nearly the entire process and are now in the stage known as the final determination phase.

Just as important, in my mind, as the opposition of the administration is the position of already-recognized Indian tribes that already have a government-to-government relationship with the U.S. Government. We have received dozens of letters and calls from across the country.

I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the tribes nationwide and four national associations in opposition to the Dodd amendment.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBAL OPPOSITION TO DODD AMENDMENT

(1) Tribes opposing amendment: 21;

(2) Tribal association opposing amendment: 5;

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President, these tribes and organizations from across the United States, from Indian country, have declared their universal opposition. Indeed, they are dismayed that we would be considering making such a sea change on Federal Indian policy through the appropriations process. Since tribes have been playing by the rules and some, indeed, have waited for years for recognition, it seems to me a bit unfair to put this in an appropriations bill.

The Committee on Indian Affairs has held many hearings on the issue of recognition and recognition reform over the past several years. We also heard from several Native groups that the process has taken generations and people have actually died waiting for recognition.

I find it somewhat ironic that descendants of Native people who have lived on this continent for thousands of years have to document who they are to a government set up by primarily post-Columbian immigrants.

One thing that has become crystal clear from our hearings—and this has been documented by the GAO and inspector general reports—is that this agency, the Branch Acknowledgment Research, BAR, is not able to provide information in a timely manner to either the Native American petitioners or to outside interested groups. That is where we should be putting our emphasis and providing more money for that process.

A substantial contributing factor is the flood of requests under the Freedom of Information Act. These FOIAs, as they are called, are keeping the BAR in a state of constant churning of documents, preventing them from performing their core tasks.

Those asking for reforms must recognize the process in place is made worse by the avalanche of lawsuits filed by local communities, State attorneys general, and some suits by already-recognized tribes. I fail to see how providing even more opportunities for lawyers to inject themselves into the process, and generate more lawsuits, is an improvement over the process. If we are going to reform the acknowledgment process, we should make sure we are providing reforms—true reforms—that provide benefits not just for States, the attorneys general, and the lawyers, but also for the petitioning groups themselves.

Finally, I cannot support an appropriations rider that would so substantially impact a regulatory process that has been in place for 25 years and through which so many participants are still working their way.

Placing a moratorium on the process and altering the evidentiary standard is a dramatic change in policy and should not be made without very careful consideration. I could only support such drastic actions if I were presented with credible proof of actual fraud or something equally bad.

I must add that I do support one provision of my colleague's amendment and legislation; that is, as I mentioned, to substantially increase the funds that the BAR receives to conduct its research. In fact, I encourage both my colleagues, Senator DODD and Senator LIEBERMAN, and would join with them in efforts in obtaining the $10 million authorized in this legislation rather than a smaller amount that is in his amendment.

Providing greater resources to the BAR would enable experienced and capable people, whether genealogists, anthropologists, or archeologists, to do their work and provide an answer in a timely manner.

In conclusion, I ask my colleagues to support the motion of the Senator from Hawaii, our chairman, Mr. INOUYE, to table.

I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON of Nebraska). Who yields time?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I yield myself 12 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, first, may I say I am most grateful to my colleague from Connecticut for his gracious remarks. He knows very well it is a very difficult chore to be speaking against his amendment. When one thinks of the friendship that started since the time of his father, this is not easy, but I believe most respectfully that the amendment my colleague from Connecticut presents is not proper.

He says he is for reform. We are all for reform. As my colleague from Connecticut pointed out, there are tribes that have been waiting not a year, not 5 years, but decades to even be recognized for consideration by the administration. This will further prolong it.

Those of us who serve on the Indian Affairs Committee have had reason to pay special attention to the State of Connecticut for quite a few years now—in no small part because of the tensions that we read about in the media reports that appear to be arising out of the fact that the two Federally-recognized tribes in southeastern Connecticut—the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe and the Mohegan Tribe—are conducting gaming activities on their lands under the authority of the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act—as is their right to do under that Federal law.

Because we have been monitoring the public dialogue in the State of Connecticut rather closely, and because the hearing the Committee on Indian Affairs held last week on Senator DODD'S authorization bill, from which the elements of his amendment to the Interior appropriations bill are drawn, I would like to take a few moments to acquaint my colleagues with the dynamics that are at play in the State of Connecticut as I understand them.

Pursuant to the compacts each of those two tribes entered into with the State of Connecticut, in exchange for the exclusive authorization to operate certain forms of class III gaming, as defined in the Federal law, the two tribes have been making payments to the State of Connecticut from the revenues derived from the operation of slot machines.

Those funds are intended, as I understand it, to defray the costs of any impacts that the tribes' conduct of gaming activities may have on the surrounding towns and communities.

Unfortunately, despite the fact that together, over the past nine years, the two tribes have thus far paid the State of Connecticut $2.2 billion, the towns most directly affected by an increase in traffic and business, have not received funding from the State of Connecticut that they feel is adequate to address their needs.

This is what one of the councilmen from one of the towns nearest the Mashantucket Pequot indicated in his testimony before the Committee on Indian Affairs last week. I have no doubt that his perceptions are sincerely-held, nor that they are shared by others in his town.

It is not my place to question the decisions of the State of Connecticut in allocating the funds the State has received from the tribes, but it seems to me that we might well not be here today, were those towns in close proximity to the Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun gaming facilities and hotels not experiencing impacts that were intended to be addressed by the substantial payments—and I think $2.2 billion is substantial by any measure—that both tribes have made to the State of Connecticut thus far.

I raise these issues that are seemingly unrelated to the matter we address today, because the local Connecticut town officials have repeatedly suggested that there is a direct relationship between the process by which the United States Government recognizes the inherent sovereignty of tribal groups and the impacts of gaming activities from which they seek financial relief from the Federal Government.

I have no doubt that the citizens of Connecticut would acknowledge that there are Indian tribes and Native people who are also citizens of Connecticut, because as early as the 1600's, long before this nation was formed, Connecticut established five reservations to serve as homelands for the Indian people of Connecticut.

Thus, for over 400 years, Connecticut has, by its own action, recognized that there are Indian tribes who have historically and traditionally, made their homes in Connecticut—and indeed, that Indian tribes occupied the area that is now the State of Connecticut, long before Connecticut established Indian reservations.

So the arguments that give rise to my friend's amendment cannot be that the State of Connecticut does not recognize the Indian tribes of Connecticut.

No, the argument advanced by the non-Indian citizens of Connecticut and some officials of the State of Connecticut seems to be that the United States should not recognize the Indian tribes that have historically occupied the area that is now the State of Connecticut.

And so, unusual activities are being initiated by State and local officials, to prevent the United States from recognizing these Connecticut tribes.

These activities include litigation, of course, but they also include the hiring of genealogists and anthropologists and historians, and even former employees of the Bureau of Indian Affairs' Branch of Acknowledgment, in an effort to develop information that could serve to prove that the Indian tribes that are recognized by the State of Connecticut either are not Indian tribes, or at least, that they are not Indian tribes which should be recognized by the United States.

I don't suppose that I am the only one to whom this position appears fundamentally and inherently contradictory.

In any event, it is clear that there are citizens and local governments in Connecticut and even the State of Connecticut who are expending substantial sums and considerable energy to oppose the Federal acknowledgment of Connecticut tribes, and that they believe the United States should subsidize their expenditures.

Indeed, Senator DODD has a bill pending in the Committee on Indian Affairs that would provide grants to State and local governments so that they could be better able to carry on their fight.

That is one set of issues.

Another set of issues has to do with the erroneous perception—and sadly I think perhaps this inaccurate portrait is drawn somewhat deliberately—that acknowledgment by the United States that a tribal group is an Indian tribe, leads directly and automatically to the conduct of gaming.

In fact, the vast majority of Federally-recognized tribes in the United States are not engaged in the conduct of gaming activities under the authority of Federal law, and many, like the great Navajo Nation—the largest land-based Indian tribe in the United States—have consistently rejected gaming as a means of economic development.

The acknowledgment of an Indian tribe by the Secretary of the Interior does not even entail the establishment of a land base that could serve as the homeland for tribal members.

No, instead, there is a separate process to determine whether land should be taken into trust for an Indian tribe—a process which provides for significant involvement of State Governors, as well as State legislatures and local governments.

That process is not an easy one—there are tribes across the country who will verify that it takes years—as much as 10 to 20 years—to have land taken into trust.

And that is only step one..

Should a tribe want to pursue gaming as a means of economic development, there is a separate process with even higher burdens to meet—for the taking of land into trust for gaming purposes.

In this process, for land that is to be taken into trust for purposes of gaming after October 17, 1988, there is not only a prohibition in Federal law that has only limited exceptions, but a far greater role for the Governor of each State in whether land is taken into trust for gaming. Some commentators have even suggested that this role that each Governor is afforded under Federal law constitutes an absolute veto power.

So to conclude, it is abundantly clear to anyone who cares to conduct even the most superficial survey of Federal Indian law, that the acknowledgment of an Indian tribe by the United States is a process that is separate and decidedly distinct from the issue of gaming.

Though some may see it as being to their advantage to lump these different processes together and make it appear that they are all one—as one who has served on the Committee on Indian Affairs for 24 years now, I can assure my colleagues that it simply is not so.

As the Chairman of the Republican National Committee, Marc Racicot, recently was quoted as responding to the notion that people are mixing Federal recognition with Indian gaming, "Is the question really about the Federal recognition process or is it about gambling? Frankly, I think people should address those questions honestly."

As my colleagues know, Marc Racicot is the former Governor and former attorney general for many years of the State of Montana.

In that same interview that was published ten days ago, Governor Racicot indicated that his experience with Federal recognition has not been mired in "irregularities and improprieties" as alleged by Connecticut officials. Instead, Governor Racicot stated "the process is clear, plain and steeped in integrity".

If Governor Racicot's observations were the exception to a perception widely-held across the country, we might have a different set of circumstances to address.

But the problems that are cited by the citizens of Connecticut are clearly different from those that have been identified by administration officials, both past and present, by petitioning groups, by the General Accounting Office, and by those who have testified before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Of course, like any new venture that bring more people, more traffic, and more revenues into a State, there have been concerns expressed about the impacts of gaming—in our history as a country we saw them first in New Jersey and Nevada.

Today gaming, whether it is Government-sponsored or privately-owned gaming, whether it is tribally-operated or commercially-conducted—from State lotteries to horse tracks to river boats, gaming has given rise to controversy.

As we consider the amendment of my friend from Connecticut, let those of us who know the difference, keep gaming issues separate, and focus on the Federal acknowledgment process.

Could the Federal acknowledgment process benefit from reform?

I don't think there is any question that it could.

The committees of Congress—the Indian Affairs Committee in the Senate—would not have held so many hearings over the years and would not have considered so many proposals to reform the process, were it not in need of refinement.

The problem is that we do not have agreement on the nature of the problem and even less agreement on the appropriate resolution.

If you asked tribal groups that have been through the acknowledgment process or that have petitions now pending before the Branch of Acknowledgment, I believe you would find unanimity in their view that the process takes too long.

In testimony on Senator DODD's authorizing bill that was presented to the Indian Affairs Committee last week, the chairperson of the Eastern Pequot Tribe—a tribe recognized by the State of Connecticut since the 1600's—testified that the tribe's petition has been pending in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, BIA, for 24 years.

The BIA's records clearly document that the experience of the Eastern Pequot is not atypical.

Each of the Assistant Secretaries for Indian Affairs within the Department of Interior over the past several Administrations—both Republican and Democrat—have stated their views that the process is too long, too cumbersome, and too expensive for the petitioning tribal groups.

The last Assistant Secretary implemented reforms to streamline the process. The current Assistant Secretary is taking further steps to address the backlog in petitions, because by most calculations, it will take the Branch of Acknowledgment another 200 years to complete work on the petitions that are now pending before the Department.

Senator DODD's amendment does not address the seriously-problematic length of the acknowledgment process nor does it seek to reduce the burden on petitioning groups, and so Indian tribes across the country have contacted the Committee to indicate that they do not see this amendment as effecting the kind of reform that has long been seen as necessary.

Unfortunately, Senator DODD's amendment will lengthen the process for those tribal groups who are subject to the proposed moratorium by yet another year, at a minimum, given that we cannot know how much time will be entailed in the promulgation of the rules and regulations required by the amendment.

Experience would instruct us that this moratorium will last for much longer than a year.

The General Accounting Office examined the acknowledgment process in its November 2001 report to the Congress, and found that the seven mandatory criteria which each petitioning group must satisfy, were not being applied in a consistent manner. The conclusions of the GAO report corroborated another long-held view in Indian country.

What the amendment does propose is something that, in the view of many of us who have struggled with these issues for years, requires a much more thorough vetting before it is made part of the permanent body of Federal law.

That is the fundamental question of whether the acknowledgment of a tribal group by the United States should be an adversarial process in which other governments should participate.

Although the current process provides for the involvement of "interested parties" in formal meetings and in the process of appeals, and State and local governments have made very effective use of the Freedom of Information Act requests to further bring the snail's pace of the acknowledgment process to a grinding halt, there has been no national discussion and no nationwide consultation within Indian country on this fundamental issue.

Yet, the amendment before us proposes to inject a process of adversarial hearings—at the request of any and all interested parties—throughout the acknowledgment process, and it would appear, before a petition is even ready for consideration.

Another change that the amendment imposes is a change in the burden of proof that a petitioner must meet in satisfying the seven mandatory criteria.

The impact of such a change has not been assessed—it would effect a change in existing law—and there can be no doubt that tribal groups who have been through the process and have not succeeded will now come to the Government seeking reconsideration under the new standard.

Even more likely is the prospect that interested parties will contest the Secretary's findings in favor of acknowledgment on the grounds that those groups that have been acknowledged may not have satisfied the new standard.

Reopening every past action of acknowledgment by the Secretary to assess whether the new standard would have changed the outcome in each case is clearly going to require years and years of effort and litigation.

I think we would all agree that generating new lawsuits against the government is not a direction that reform should take.

Last but certainly not least problematic from the vantage point of Indian country, petitioning groups, from the administration, the authorizing committees of the Congress, and from the Indian Affairs Committee is the moratorium that Senator DODD's amendment would impose on the acknowledgment process.

This moratorium affects not only the groups that have been in the process for twenty years or more, and not only the groups whose petitions are the subject of Federal district court orders, but also groups that are already through the acknowledgment process and currently in the appeals phase.

Particularly in the case of this last group, there has been no rationale advanced as to why a moratorium should be imposed on their petitions in order to reform a process of which they are no longer a part.

Like many of us, I read the newspapers and media accounts from other States. Over the years, I have even spent a little work time in Connecticut trying to be of assistance to the citizens of Connecticut. So I think I have a sense of what pressures are brought to bear on the Members of Congress who serve that State.

Working together, I think we can address the concerns that were expressed at the Indian Affairs Committee hearing last week, but I have to say, as chairman of the authorizing committee, that proposed changes in substantive law and regulations require and deserve careful consideration.

If the provisions of Senator DODD's authorizing measure are to become law, they should be considered in their entirety—not in piecemeal fashion in an appropriations bill—and they should be considered in the context of what reform is needed—as defined by a much larger base of our national citizenry than the citizens of one State.

And so I call upon my colleague from Connecticut to work with us to effect comprehensive reform, and in the interim, to allow the administration to take the steps it has proposed to improve upon the current process with funds appropriated for that purpose.

All of the tribal groups that would be immediately affected by the proposed moratorium filed their petitions well before the advent of Federally-authorized Indian gaming.

They couldn't have been motivated by the prospects of something that did not exist when they filed their petitions and should not be penalized for what has since come to pass.

Let us keep these matters separate, addressing the impact of gaming as they arise, and addressing reform of the Federal acknowledgment process with the deliberative discussion that it deserves.

With these considerations in mind, I urge my colleagues to oppose Senator DODD's amendment.

I will share footnotes in history that we may have forgotten over the years. Our Founding Fathers felt so strongly about the importance of Indian nations that in the Constitution of the United States they have set forth, in good language, that Indians should be recognized as sovereign countries and as sovereign nations. We have entered into 800 treaties with Indian countries, as we do with the British, the Germans, the French, the Japanese, and the Chinese.

Indians are sovereign. I realize it is very difficult for fellow Americans to look upon the Indians as sovereign people, but they are. They were here before we arrived. This was their land.

Sadly, I must report that the Senate—of the 800 treaties we have had signed by the President of the United States and by the ruling monarchy of the nation, 430 were ratified by our predecessors and 370 are still in the files. They are in the files because we found oil, gold, and precious material and suddenly we felt, no, we cannot give that away.

Of the 430 we ratified, we violated provisions in every single one of them. That is our record. I am not proud of it. I think the Indians have waited a long time for justice, and I am sorry to say to my dearest friend of all that this does not bring justice to them.

When the first European landed here, he found a sophisticated and organized group of people. They had elected leaders. They had a judiciary. In fact, if one reads the writings of Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin, they will note reference to the Iroquois Confederacy, a confederacy made up of six tribes, six nations. Each tribe elected their representatives, the judiciary, their leader. They sent a delegation of representatives to the central office, and the clan mothers voted to select the supreme chief. In those days, long before we came on the scene, the women took part in the electoral process. They were a few years ahead of us. That was democracy as our forefathers conceived.

Laws were passed to further strengthen the basis of sovereignty. At the time they were recognized as sovereign nations, these Indian nations had jurisdiction, authority, and control over 550 million acres of land. Since then we have had the Indian wars, and let us call it what it was, Indian extermination laws. We had what is known as an allotment. Let's open it up. From 550 million acres, today there are 50 million left.

One of the provisions in this amendment speaks of lands where they historically resided. Most of the Indians of this land do not live in places where they historically resided. The Cherokees now live in Oklahoma. After the Indian wars, they were rounded up from the Carolinas, and before they landed in Oklahoma, the dumping ground, 80 percent were dead.

So where is the historic place of residence? One can say that of just about every Indian tribe. This is what we are dealing with.

In the State of Connecticut, there are two very successful Indian casinos, Mohegan Sun and Foxwoods. In the last 9 years, they have provided income to the State of $2.2 billion because that is part of the agreement with the State of Connecticut. That is a lot of money.

We cannot intrude ourselves into the affairs of the State and say you should give that money to the town next to Foxwood or next to Mohegan because the impact is greater. That is the State's decision. I would think the moneys these Indians have provided for the government of Connecticut should be sufficient, but that is not within our responsibility.

Another footnote in history: One would get the impression after listening to this debate that most of these Indians who are seeking recognition and who are seeking land are seeking such land for gambling purposes. Far from the truth, sir. Most of them do not want gambling. In fact, the largest Indian tribe in our Nation is the Navajos. They will not permit gaming within their lands. No, they do not want any gambling in their lands.

Of those treaties that were not ratified by the Congress—still in the files around here—there are several that affected the Indian nations of California. Because the treaties were not considered, in a sense they are men and women without nations, without land. We decided to put them in a little enclave and say: You live here or you live there because you look alike.

My first chore as chairman of this committee was to break up a tribe because we had put in Pequots and Hoopa-Huroks, historic fighters.

Just in case one gets the impression the Indians are "give me, give me, give me, all the time," they have given more than any one of us can expect. As one who values the service of men and women in uniform, may I simply say that of all the ethnic groups in the United States, of all the racial groups in the United States, on the basis of per capita participation, the Indians have sent more sons and daughters in uniform to face harm's way than any other ethnic group—more than the Germans, the Irish, the British, or what have you. Indians have fought in every war in the last century, and every one now, in greater numbers. They have given their lives in greater numbers, per capita. They are not asking for a handout. They are asking for what the Constitution calls for and what the laws of this land call for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DODD. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I thank my friend and colleague from Connecticut.

In a little over an hour the Senate will vote on the amendment Senator DODD and I have introduced which we believe will reform and strengthen the Federal tribal recognition process to the benefit of the Native American community and everyone else concerned. It will make that process more fair and give it more credibility and hopefully will provide the resources to have the decisions on tribal recognition made by the BIA and the BAR in a much more timely fashion.

Some tribes have been waiting years and years and years for a decision from this recognition process that is, regrettably, broken. Of course, in part it is broken because of the gambling associated with Native American tribal recognition and the surge of applications, the dramatic interest in recognition. Often, recognition leads to the presence of gambling in a locality and the inability of these regulatory authorities to keep up with that extraordinary increase in demands on them.

In Connecticut—a relatively small State, yet we have three federally recognized tribes—one recently recognized tribe is being appealed and nine more recognition petitions from our small State are in the pipeline of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. We have in two of the federally recognized tribes the two largest casinos in North America, I believe in the world. So there is an impact that these decisions have.

That is why, last year, my colleague from Connecticut and I introduced S. 1392 and S. 1393, which were designed to reform and improve the process by which the Federal Government recognizes the sovereign status of American Indian tribes and their tribal governments. We certainly did not view this as antirecognition because there is a historic, a moral right to recognition by tribes that can meet the requirements of this process. Nor was it, as we conceived of it, inherently antigambling. It was to say that the decisions have taken on extraordinary importance and they ought to be reached by a process that is not only fair in itself and gives all participants—the tribes claiming recognition, the neighbors of the tribal grounds, towns, et cetera—the belief that they have been through a process that is fair and therefore that the results of the process, the decisions made, are credible.

We have introduced this amendment reluctantly because the problems with the tribal recognition process have not gotten better, notwithstanding concerns expressed by many, as has been indicated here.

As my colleague from Connecticut has said, this happens to be a problem that has impacted Connecticut, a relatively small State, but this is really a national problem affecting Native Americans seeking tribal recognition in the States in which they are now located.

Let me quote from the GAO report, which has been cited, which found that "the basis for BIA's tribal recognition decisions is not always clear."

It went on to state:

> While there are set criteria that petitioners must meet to be granted recognition, there is no clear guidance that explains how to interpret key aspects of the criteria. For example, it is not always clear what level of evidence is sufficient to demonstrate a tribe's continuous existence over a period of time—one of the key aspects of the criteria. As a result, there is less regulatory certainty about the basis for recognition decisions.

That is from a critical report by the GAO on this recognition process. That GAO critique has been seconded by the Interior Department's inspector general and, as has been noted in this debate, even by the past Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs.

Despite these critiques, there have been no real changes in the recognition process to fix the problems. Instead, the status quo has continued at the BIA, with applicants experiencing long delays and parties in various cases dealing with decisions that they believe have been unfairly arrived at. The amendment we will vote on at 5:30 this afternoon is our attempt to improve this situation. Rather than letting the process continue in the current manner, we ask for it to provide adequate procedures to ensure its legitimacy—something that would benefit both the tribes and the communities and parties that surround them.

I want to stress that this amendment does nothing to affect already recognized Federal tribes or to hinder their economic development plans; nor does it change existing Federal tribal recognition laws. It is our hope, in fact, and has been our hope, that the Native American tribes might support these procedural reforms that we are recommending so as to buttress the legitimacy of the ultimate recognition rulings.

While, as my friends and colleagues from Colorado and Hawaii have indicated, that is not the case and, in fact, a large number of Native American tribes have opposed this amendment, I continue to hope the fact that we have brought it before the Senate may encourage them, under the wise and fair leadership of the Senator from Hawaii, Mr. INOUYE, and the Senator from Colorado, Mr. CAMPBELL, to see if we can't find common ground.

It seems to me no matter what side you are on in a particular proceeding before the BAR or BIA, you have an interest in due process and you have an interest in the result of the process being as broadly credible as possible.

What our amendments would do consistent with recognition laws is to ensure that recognition criteria are satisfied and that all affected parties, including affected neighboring towns, have a chance to fairly participate in the decision process. Our amendment ensures a system of notice to affected parties. It assures that relevant evidence from petitioners and interested parties, including neighboring towns, is properly considered; that a formal hearing may be requested with an opportunity for witnesses to be called and with other due process procedures in place; that a transcript of the hearing is kept; that the evidence is sufficient to show the petitioner meets the seven mandatory criteria of Federal regulations; and that a complete and detailed explanation of the final decisions and findings of fact are published in the Federal Register. There is nothing very radical here. It is basic due process procedural rights, all consistent with the established recognition criteria. We have not changed the recognition criteria in the amendment that we proposed.

Under the amendment, funding available under the Interior appropriations bill to the Bureau of Indian Affairs for the recognition process becomes available when these fundamental due process procedures are implemented by the Secretary of the Interior. So insofar as this is considered a moratorium, it is a moratorium, as I know Senator DODD has indicated, that could end in a week if these due process changes were put into effect. Our amendment dictates no outcomes in any particular cases. It aims to ensure a fair process.

So I hope my colleagues will take a look at the amendment. In some sense the impact of the currently broken process at the BIA has been felt with a particular intensity in Connecticut. But this is a national problem.

We may not adopt this amendment today. I hope we will, but if we do not, this is a problem that is not going to go away. It is going to be felt more and more around the country. Again, I say our aspiration is to find common ground. I thank the Chairman, Senator INOUYE, and Senator CAMPBELL for their characteristic courtesy and respect and thoughtfulness. We disagree on this one. It is a disagreement in good faith on both sides. I continue to express the hope that under their leadership, those who are concerned about the fairness of the recognition process, those who are concerned about the lack of speed in the process—the terrible delays—will be able to come together and agree on a series of reforms, and then the funding for additional staff at the BAR and BIA to make the promise of due process here real for all concerned.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 2 minutes remaining. The Senator from Colorado has 3 minutes 53 seconds remaining.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I see the majority whip. I ask unanimous consent we extend the debate an additional 10 minutes, equally divided, so we can make some concluding remarks.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I think that would be appropriate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President, I have made most of my comments already. I don't know who else will be here on the floor to speak against the Dodd-Lieberman amendment, but I would like to respond to just two small points that were made by our friend, Senator LIEBERMAN.

First, though, let me thank Senator INOUYE for a very eloquent statement. He really does speak from the heart. When you hear him talk about basic fairness and justice that American Indians deserve and need, I think Senator INOUYE's own experience and background as a Japanese-American and what his people went through in World War II gives him a very special insight, and certainly a very special feeling for what Indian people face.

Let me make two very short comments on Senator LIEBERMAN's remarks. He made reference that this would not affect existing tribes. He is right, I guess, in some respects. But I think we need to look at that in historical context.

First of all, when the original recognition process was done—clear back in the early 1800s—it was done so that the Federal Government could provide rations, blankets, and so on, to the Indian tribes that were deprived at that time of their hunting rights and restricted to certain areas. That is why it was originally set up. They had to find out who qualified to get some benefits, and that is what trust authority is about.

It will not surprise anyone in this Chamber to know that there were some people even at that time who did not want recognition. Certainly some of them hid out in the hills of the Carolinas because of the Trail of Tears, when their cousins and brothers and fathers were rounded up and driven at gunpoint clear across the Nation to Oklahoma. The ones who hid out in the Southeast States—would you want to tell some government bent on killing your people you want to be recognized? Not likely; that would be a pretty dumb thing to do.

There have been Indian people in some parts of this country all along who were not "recognized" by the U.S. Government. It didn't mean they were not Indian. It didn't mean anything of the sort. They knew very well what would happen to them if they were so-called recognized.

The second point I want to make is during the 1950s, during what was called the Termination Act, the Federal Government, in its infinite wisdom, decided many Indian tribes were no longer tribes. I guess that meant they were no longer Indians, at least not of a group of Indians. That has always rather confused me because I have always likened it to maybe telling African Americans that they were no longer Black. I mean, you are what God made you. That's it.

But through the Termination Act of the 1950s—I don't remember the exact number, and I don't have it in my notes—as I just offhand remember, there were over a hundred, if not several hundred, tribes who were told by the Federal Government: You are no longer Indian tribes.

Many of them are still trying to be rerecognized. The ones that were terminated in the 1950s, they have to get recognized through a different process. They have to do it through legislation.

But the point is the fact that many of them that historically had ancestors on this continent maybe for 10,000 years were being told by a government set up by new immigrants that they were no longer Indian tribes still confuses me.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. I thank my colleague from Connecticut, Mr. LIEBERMAN, for a very eloquent statement. Let me also thank my colleague from Hawaii for a very eloquent statement he has made. I would not take issue with any comment he made about the relationship between the history of the U.S. Government and its treatment of Native American tribes going back to the founding days of this Republic.

It is a sorry history in many instances and circumstances.

The Senator very graciously mentioned my father. Let me mention my mother. My mother used to tell me all the time that two wrongs do not make a right.

That we have done a terrible injustice to Native American people over the years does not justify, in my view, continuing a process that would allow recognition to occur where it may not be warranted. In America, where recognition should be extended and granted, the process must be fair. As for the recognition process—its history—my friend from Colorado makes a very strong statement. It is something of a historic anomaly in many ways; that's why recognition must even occur. The fact is that the current process is the law of the land.

I can speak very directly about my own State. It is a difficult process, which is still ongoing for that matter. There are those in my State and others who would like to undo the recognition extended to the Mashantucket Pequots. Books have been written about it. Popular books have been written. That garnered national attention in questioning the recognition of that tribe. I have disagreed with them.

I also know the process that the Mohican Tribe went through in my State. It was a very long and elaborate process, working very closely with the community leaders in the towns in which they are located—State, as well as the National Government.

Our point here is not about the history, as much as concern about the history is justified. It is not about the past, as legitimate as those arguments are. It is about today and the future.

Let me quote, if I can, a letter I received from the National Congress of American Indians.

By the way, the amendment that is part of the bill was considered for over a year and isn't written out of whole cloth. I showed this amendment to Native Americans around the country and asked them what they thought of the amendment.

This letter I received from Tex Hall is dated September 12 of this year. He opposes the amendment. Let me be very clear. The National Congress of American Indians opposes the Dodd-Lieberman amendment, but listen to what he says in the letter. I am reading from the second paragraph.

> And I believe that tribal leaders agree with you it must be a rigorous process requiring the petitioner to demonstrate historical and continuous American Indian identity in a distinct community. We believe that the process could benefit from a serious review by Congress and a codification of the process and the criteria.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL CONGRESS OF AMERICAN INDIANS,
Washington, DC, September 12, 2002.

Re Opportunity to Meet and Discuss Federal Recognition Process.

Hon. CHRISTOPHER J. DODD,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DODD: On behalf of the more than 250 member Tribal Nations of the National Congress of American Indians, I write to request an opportunity to meet with you and a group of tribal leaders to discuss proposals to change the process for petitioning the federal government for recognition as a federally-recognized Indian tribe.

Both the federal government and the NCAI have a longstanding position that legitimate Indian tribes whose status has been historically omitted should have the right to petition for formal recognition by the federal government. And I believe that tribal leaders agree with you it must be a rigorous process requiring the petitioner to demonstrate historical and continuous American Indian identity in a distinct community. We believe that the process could benefit from a serious review by Congress and a codification of the process and the criteria.

The current process is plagued by an enormous backlog, and some petitioners have been waiting over two decades since they submitted their initial petitions. NCAI believes that the federal government should make the resources available so that petitions can be processed in a timely way.

As you know, we do not agree with your pending amendment. We believe it would create an indefinite moratorium on the recognition process. Because there is no incentive for the Secretary to actually create the new process, the petitioning tribes would be put in limbo for additional years, adding to the unjustness of the already interminable federal delays.

In addition, by attempting to create a moratorium on federal tribal recognition through the introduction of an amendment to the Interior Appropriation bill, this amendment attempts to circumvent the Congress' procedures for dealing with complex Indian issues like federal recognition. Such a drastic change in federal Indian policy should be referred to the authorizing committees for development of the record and an opportunity for broader participation and deliberation. While we greatly appreciate the contacts from your office, two days notice is not nearly enough time to engage tribal leaders in a meaningful discussion.

As I mentioned above, I would very much like to meet with you to discuss these matters in greater detail and would be willing to put together a small group of tribal leaders to participate in the discussion. I believe that we should also include Senators Inouye and Campbell in the discussion, so that this issue can be prepared for review by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs.

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

Sincerely,

TEX G. HALL,
President.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, my colleagues ought to know that in the concluding paragraphs of the letter he disagrees with this amendment.

But his conclusion about a process that needs repair is one that is embraced almost by all.

My good friend from Colorado has legislation pending that would move the present recognition process from the BIA to a new commission. I agree with him on that approach. I believe it will take time to get that done. I presume there will be regulations and the like appended to it.

It is not a question of debate about whether or not the process is in need of repair. It appears that everybody agrees with them because of what has happened and the various circumstances. We are talking about 222 petitions, and maybe more—all of which may be legitimate. But shouldn't we know in the end that there has been a process followed fairly by all and that there will be at the end of the day a conclusion that is just and reasonable and will withstand the test of time? That is all we are suggesting.

The poignancy, I suppose, is because it impacts my State. I am aware of it because of what's going on in my State. If I had no petitions pending in my State, I wouldn't be standing here. I wouldn't be aware of the issue. But we are aware of it.

I am worried about the future for the very same reasons that history suggests—that we will find out again that there is unnecessary division, hostility, and resentment growing. That should not be the case.

I strongly urge that this amendment not be defeated—I suspect that it may be—and that we do something soon to repair a process that looks too cavalier. If there is just going to be recognition of all petitions coming forward, why don't we just say so straight out? If there is going to be a process to demonstrate satisfaction of some particular criteria, let us make sure it works. As it is now, it is catch as catch can. Sometimes the rules apply. Sometimes they don't. Of the seven criteria, some we follow rigorously, and some we don't at all. Some are applied in some cases and not in others. Some petitioners are granted, some are denied, and some are brought together. There are third choices inexplicably made.

This isn't working right. It needs to be repaired. We can do that in a very short order because we recommend no new criteria. We just say codify the existing criteria, put it in shape, and let everybody know that the process is working so they can go through it in a reasonable way. It is outrageous that they should have to wait two or three decades for recognition.

The fact is that we have supported additional resources here to the agency to try to provide the technical staff so decisions can be made within a reasonable amount of time. With these resources, people can be heard and the agency can reach final conclusions that I believe all Americans can support.

That is what this amendment tries to do—nothing more than that and nothing less than that, but nothing more than that.

Again, I suspect the amendment will be defeated, but I hope the end result is that we can get a better system. My State may regrettably find itself with some petitions granted that do not deserve to be, but maybe that is the price you pay for doing something about broader reform.

I regret that there had to be a disagreement between people who support Native Americans. I admire them immensely. But as I look down the road here, I worry that if we don't straighten this situation out that we could find the situation getting worse. I don't want to see that happen. For those reasons, I urge adoption of the amendment.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, is there any time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes seventeen seconds.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, if the Senate should rule that the votes against the amendment prevail, may I assure my colleagues that the committee stands ready to consider any and all suggestions on how to reform this process. It is a scandal at this time. We realize that. It should be changed.

I move to table the amendment.

Mr. DODD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the motion to proceed to the motion entered to reconsider the vote whereby cloture was not invoked on amendment No. 4480 is agreed to and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

There will now be 60 minutes for debate with respect to that cloture motion, with the time equally divided and controlled by the two leaders or their designees.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the Republicans have still 10 minutes as if in morning business. The time is yielded on this Dodd amendment, but there are still 10 minutes of morning business to which Republicans are entitled. Do they intend to use that?

Of course, we will have time later this evening, as we always do. I ask unanimous consent that we move forward, as the Chair announced, and that the time allocated be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. President, point of information: What time will the vote on the Dodd amendment take place?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At approximately 5:37.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, it is my understanding that we are on H.R. 5093. Is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate cloture motion having been presented under Rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close the debate on the Byrd amendment No. 4480, as amended, to H.R. 5093, the Department of Interior Appropriations bill, 2003.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I understand that between now and 5:30 we have been allotted time to debate the Craig-Domenici amendment as it relates to the cloture motion on the Byrd amendment on the Interior bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CRAIG. Thank you.

Mr. President, I will allot myself 10 minutes to debate this issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, for several weeks now, the Senate has been considering the Interior appropriations bill, of which the Byrd amendment to that bill would put critical fire money back into our Forest Service budgets that have been badly depleted by the season that we are hopefully beginning to leave, which is known as the fire season, especially in the Great Basin West. That money is critical.

But it was because of our concern about fires and the wildfires that have swept through the West this summer that I and Senator DOMENICI and a good many other western colleagues joined in working with the administration, and for a good long while in a very bipartisan way, to see if there was not some middle ground to create some flexibility to go into those worst fuel-laden lands and to develop a thinning and cleaning process that would be environmentally sensitive and at the same time effectively reduce the fuel loading that has gone on there that has precipitated in some of these very dramatic wildfires that have occurred out West this summer.

I recite, again, for the record, we have burned well over 6.5 million acres to date of wildlife habitat and watershed, possibly several million acres of old-growth forests. We have lost about 3,000 homes, private homes of our citizens. Over 25 people, I believe—26 or 27 at least—have been killed in relation to these fires. It is without question a national emergency, a national crisis. I almost have the sense that we have fiddled a bit over the last couple of weeks while our forests have burned.

There are still fires burning in California. As we speak, acreage burning in a national forest outside of Los Angeles over the weekend has consumed over 12,000 acres and has threatened numerous homes. Yet because of some special interests here and phenomenal allegations or statements made in the media over the last several weeks, you would think I and others were trying to precipitate a whole new logging program for the forests and that somehow was evil, instead of the very limited, targeted thinning and cleaning that we think could and should be utilized to reduce the fuel loading on these forests that has created these firestorms.

I have here a variety of editorials and news comments from major papers across the Nation. I am fascinated by words such as "nose under the tent," "intent to allow logging companies to be turned loose once again in our national forests." My reaction is, can those who write the news read the news?

Can they not read the Craig-Domenici amendment and understand that it is phenomenally limited, that it would require very specific language by the U.S. Forest Service, that there would be the right to go to Federal court and block any of these actions, that we have tied no one's hands other than to say that on these limited, targeted acres, we will not allow appeals, nor will we allow a temporary court injunction that has locked up tens of thousands of acres already, many of them that burned this summer, from the ability to get in and thin and clean them?

No. Those who write the news can read the news. But oftentimes those who write the news choose a bias that they think is popular, and in the end our forests burn. Thousands of homes are lost, lives endangered, and we struggle here at the Federal level to attempt to make some slight adjustments in public policy to return a state of health to our national forests.

Last week, our colleague from New Mexico, Senator BINGAMAN, came to the floor and offered an alternative amendment. He did not introduce it. He laid it before us as something that could be viewed as an alternative. I began to study it to try to see if it was a reasonable alternative or whether in fact it would deny any activity, if it was simply a Trojan horse in the reality of, would it do something similar to what the other Senator from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI, and I had proposed.

After thorough examination of that, I must tell you I believe the Bingaman amendment to be just that, a Trojan horse. Not only does it limit dramatically what you could be able to do, it creates some categorical exemptions. And then it does something else that is very important in the language of the law or the policy we are debating as to whether it frees the hands of the forest managers within these limited areas to do what is necessary to limit this fuel loading.

It is a term called extraordinary circumstance; in other words, there won't be any appeals based on the standards of the National Environmental Policy Act, or any temporary court injunctions, unless there is an extraordinary circumstance.

That is a provision in administrative regulations that governs the management activities of forests that is really quite clear. Let me count the number of ways an extraordinary circumstance could occur. It is literally in the eye of the beholder, in the eye of the person who wants to file the appeal. It probably broadens the effective opportunity to bring an appeal to any of these actions on our public lands when, on the other hand, the Senator from New Mexico would suggest he was creating greater flexibility.

Organizations such as the NRDC or the Earth Justice Defense League, the Sierra Club, the Wilderness Society, and the Southwest Center for Biodiversity clearly could use this as the opportunity for which they have already used the law, to lock up any effort or nearly all efforts in attempting to deal with what we would hope would be an effective way of thinning and cleaning.

You have heard me speak in the last days about the total amount of acreage out there that is in crisis at this moment. We have about 74.5 million acres that are at high risk, and while we have that many, Senator DOMENICI and I, and many of the colleagues who have joined with us—I now see the Senator from Arizona in the Chamber, who is a cosponsor, and the Senator from Montana—have asked that we only be able to deal with about 10,000,000 acres, not opening the forest wide open but a limited number, for a very real reason.

I believe it is fundamentally important that we show the American people that when we stand on the floor of the Senate and talk about not entering roadless areas and protecting old growth and merely thinning and cleaning and bringing down the fuel loads and moving them out of the forest, we want to prove it, we do want the American people to see that what we say is, in fact, what we mean, and that the U.S. Forest Service will go forward in a limited way to do just exactly that.

Do I want to prove the editorial writers of some of America's press wrong? You bet I do. Because they are wrong, and they flat know it. In fact, it reminds me of that news reporter from NPR who e-mailed some of our environmental groups and said: Get me the worst case scenario so I can disprove the logic or the arguments of the Senator from Idaho. And the environmental group writes back and says: We can't give you any worst case scenarios because we have them all on appeal and we have it shut down so they don't exist.

So in other words, when we are concerned that the appeals route would be used in these limited cases, the environmental groups have responded that they are already using them, that they are not tolerating the activities of thinning and cleaning.

So it is obvious why we would want to step forward and say, let us use this limited opportunity to thin and clean and then show the American people that there is a better way of conducting forest health and allowing our forests to once again rejuvenate themselves for watershed, for wildlife habitat.

My colleagues are here in the Chamber to speak. Let me conclude.

Even if the public policy of our country allowed it, 8 to 10 million acres to be thinned on a 1.5- to 2-year basis, and average that out over the next 20 years, we would still—because of the health of our forests today and the fuel loading that exists and the bug kill and the dead and dying—lose anywhere from 5 to 6 to 7 million acres a year to wildfire. That is the reality of the environment in which we live, the reality of the environment we are now trying to change so slightly to return forest health.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BURNS. I yield myself 5 minutes. I know there are other Senators on the floor wanting to speak. I will just speak common sense.

Legalese is not my expertise. I leave it to those trained in the discipline, as most of my expertise was on the farm.

This is a very troubling issue for one simple reason: What if anybody were allowed to put in a garden and at the same time were prohibited from doing any weeding or watering or doing anything to make it produce—prevented from fundamental attention?

I am wondering if they would enjoy the fruits of their labor when harvest time comes. They say history is the greatest blueprint to the future. Throughout history, all creation on this earth, in order to ensure its internal survival, it must have some kind of economic worth.

Now, that sounds hard and cold, doesn't it? But it happens to be a very true fact. There are those who somehow choose to look at our natural resources, or a natural landscape, and put it over into the column called "spiritual"—not logical, not economic. Our forests cannot survive the ages with that approach. Under that philosophy, what will survive longer than the forests is the pine bark beetle. Fires will continue to exist—hotter—taking from the soil what cannot be replaced by anything but old growth.

So as we approach this problem, I ask for common sense. What we are trying to do here is a commonsense approach to settle our disagreements on how we manage the forests. We hire the U.S. Forest Service to do that. When their management practices are questioned, the burden of proof falls on them to prove why that management practice will work, but I see no proof offered by those making the appeal that the Forest Service plan doesn't work. That is what we are trying to do—get it to an impartial environment to settle those differences. That is all we are asking. We are not changing any law, no environmental law, not the Environmental Protection Act, not the Clean Water Act, not the Clean Air Act, not the Forest Management Act. We are not changing any law. We are not denying anybody's right to appeal or to have their day either on an administrative appeal or a judicial appeal. We are not changing that.

That was changed, however, with regard to South Dakota. So we are not going that far. What we are saying is we are going to put the ball on the 50-yard line, which requires the burden of proof both from the land managers and by those who would disagree with them. That is all we are asking. And then the third thing we are asking is that we get a vote, a commonsense vote.

The American people, every night this summer, watched their forests burn—every night. Such a waste. There was not only the loss of the resource, but the loss of the wildlife and the habitat and the water quality because the rains will come and the snows will come and the mud will slide. Now, I don't know any other way to put that other than it has been my experience in my years of working and living in an environment of sun, water, and soil, and what it produces. So I am sorry that we have to educate and remind people that what we see outside in our natural environment does change.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to my friend from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I first ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial of the Arizona Republic this morning entitled "Forest Plan Has Merits."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOREST PLAN HAS MERITS

Interior Secretary Gale Norton may be correct about the desperate conditions of America's western forests. And she may be right, too, in her pitch that President Bush's Healthy Forests initiative is a reasonable plan for bringing them back to health.

But the Interior secretary—indeed, the entire Bush administration—is over-optimistic in the extreme if they truly believe environmentalists are going to leap on board with it.

In Phoenix last week for a Native American economic development summit, Norton detailed for the Editorial Board elements of the initiative, which would treat about 10 million forested acres deemed in critical shape.

Much of the plan is inspired by the work of such Arizona forest scientists as Wally Covington of Northern Arizona University and Stephen Campbell of the University of Arizona, both of whom have conducted or contributed to landmark forest management studies.

Covington has proposed thinning Arizona forests to 19th century conditions; Campbell's Blue Ridge Demonstration Project envisions the way to do it: By authorizing private-sector "stewards" who would perform commercial bio-mass extraction. That is, private firms that would do mostly small-tree logging, cleaning the forest of fuels and putting the wood they chop to innovative uses. In Phoenix, Norton passed around some intriguing examples of wood products produced from small-diameter trees.

Already, though, critics are labeling the proposal as a tree grab on behalf of the timber industry.

At the heart of their objections is the vast territory targeted by Bush for treatment and the means he proposes to accomplish it: Providing 10-year contracts to the "stewards" and placing restrictions on the burdensome review process that so many thinning projects over the years have had to endure.

Among the many Forest Service thinning projects reviewed and appealed to death was the 7,000-acre Baca Ecosystem Management Area in northeastern Arizona. After two years of appeals and lawsuits, only 300 acres of the Baca project were treated by the time the "Rodeo-Chediski" holocaust roared through. Today, 90 percent of the Baca area is a wasteland of dead, blackened stumps and sterilized soils.

Healthy Forests is on the right road.

Democrats in Congress are coalescing around a far more limited plan that accepts many of Bush's premises but restricts the bio-mass extraction to forests near communities. That doesn't address the plague of deep-forest destruction, and not just by fire. Federal wildlife officials have identified 46 species of fish and birds that are declining in population because of the thicketlike density of the deep forests.

The president's "stewardship" proposal deserves consideration. It seems tailor-made for Arizona, which today has no logging industry at all. Just thick, tinder-dry forests waiting to be consumed.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, this editorial points out the plan that President Bush has proposed, as largely reflected in the proposal Senator BURNS and Senator CRAIG and others have been talking about, is the way to scientifically manage our forests. We are bragging a little bit in Arizona because one of the scientists who pioneered this technique is Dr. Wally Covington of Northern Arizona University at Flagstaff. He and Stephen Campbell of the University of Arizona conducted these landmark management studies and demonstrated that by returning our forests to the conditions in which they existed 100 years ago, we can save them from disease, insect infestation, and catastrophic wildfire.

What that entails is going in and mechanically thinning and removing—thinning the small-diameter trees that clog the forests and removing that and the other debris from the forest—cleaning up the forests, in effect; then when that debris has largely been removed, introducing fire through a prescribed burn in the wet, cooler months of October or November so the fire doesn't get out of control. There is not nearly as much fuel to burn and it is cooler. Then, at that point, basically we let nature take its course. Say the next summer a lightening strikes a tree and starts a fire. What is going to happen after this debris has been cleaned out and the fuel has been removed? It will move along the grass and it may burn the grass and a few pieces of dry limbs and debris on the floor; but since most of it has been cleaned up, it is not going to create a crown fire, which causes all the damage.

Since most of the small-diameter trees have been removed, it is not going to have that ladder of trees to climb up to the canopy of the big trees.

What you have seen on television is the preheating of these big ponderosa pines from the forest fire. Then when the fire goes through the smaller trees, it climbs up the ladder of the forest into the canopy of the big trees and explodes into those giant fireballs we have all seen and have been sickened by. That is what happened in Arizona this year, when fires devastated an area the size of the State of Rhode Island. That is how much burned in Arizona. When you look at the moonscape-type of environment that now exists, you are sickened by the reality that much of this could have been prevented.

It turns out there was a project that had been proposed by the Forest Service in this area about 3 years ago, and there were about 2 years of lawsuits and appeals by environmental groups to stop this so-called Baca ecosystem management area. Well, the fire came through and only about 300 acres had been permitted to be treated by the time the fire came through because of the appeals that had been filed by these environmental groups, as a result of which about 90 percent of the Baca area has been burned. It is now nothing but sterilized soil and blackened tree trunks with no branches or pine needles on them whatsoever.

So the filing of the appeal by these environmental groups resulted in about 90 percent of this area burning rather than being treated. Some of the environmental groups will say they want to protect endangered species or old-growth trees. Well, they protected neither in this case. The fire came through and wiped them all out. Why? Because we haven't been able to thin and do prescribed burning. We could not cut out that dog hair thicket that exists in the forests because they have not been treated before. It is called dog hair thicket because they say a dog cannot run through it without leaving half of its hair behind in the snarly little trees that are growing in the area of the forest that needs to be treated.

What happens when the area is treated? You have cut out a lot of the small-diameter material and taken out the debris, and you open up the forest to the sunlight. You create an opportunity for grasses to grow, and you reintroduce butterflies, birds, insects, and small and large animals to the area.

All of a sudden, instead of a dead and dying ecosystem, you have created a very vibrant and healthy natural ecosystem.

What is our goal with respect to the trees? Our goal is to try to preserve as many of the old-growth and large-diameter trees as possible. That is what is done when we thin the forests the way we are talking about doing.

So why haven't we been able to come to some compromise on the legislation we are talking about to enable us to do this? The reason is there are radical environmental groups that, frankly, have control of some of the politics of this issue with some of our colleagues and have persuaded them that we are going to open it up to unfettered logging, we are going to log the old-growth forests, we are going to clearcut the western forests, we are going to take away any opportunity for people to have input as to what is done, we are going to destroy all the environment for endangered species, and so on.

All of that is simply wrong. It is not true. We are talking about legislation that has very significant limits. These thinning projects have to be approved by all of the different groups, the so-called stakeholders, the environmental process, the NEPA process where the forest plan has to have been followed.

The whole point of the stewardship projects, as they are called, is to enable us to go in and clean out the forests, leaving the large trees. That is the whole point.

Under our legislation citizens would be permitted to file a lawsuit in court and appeal the plan if they want to. Nothing stops them from doing that. All they have to do is point out to the judge: Look, the object here was to save these big trees and cut out the underbrush. Well, they are not doing that in this case, if there ever were such a plan proposed.

I do not think they want to have to face up to the reality of what we have proposed, which is a very reasonable way to manage our forests. In many respects, they would rather cut off their nose to spite their face. That is a phrase I used earlier today, and one of my young staff said: What does that mean? It is a phrase my grandmother used to say. It means you are basically so selfish about what you want to do that you are not willing to look at the larger picture, which would enable you to save yourself if you would apply management techniques.

We could apply this management technique to thin the forests and do prescribed burning and, thus, prevent the kind of disease or forest fires that in the past have ravaged these forests and absolutely wiped out the habitats. Some people would rather have the fires exist to catastrophically burn the entire area and ruin the habitat for the endangered species and all other species because at least that did not permit the loggers to log big trees. That is right, it did not permit the cutting of any kind of trees.

What was the result? It burned the entire forest. So the entire ecosystem is now dead, and it will take literally hundreds of years to come back and produce those big, beautiful trees we all want to save.

It is a sorry state of affairs that we have not been able to achieve a result on this issue. I hoped we would have been able to do so. I hope my colleagues will not vote for cloture when that vote comes in the next 10 or 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I see no one else in the Chamber to yield time, so I ask unanimous consent to speak an additional 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I will go on to explore this a little bit more.

One of the techniques of the opponents of what we propose is to say—we all agree with the management. I have not heard anybody say they disagree with this thinning and prescribed burning management technique, but they want it done in an area called the urban/wildland interface; that is to say, where the forest meets communities—summer homes, small towns, so on. We will thin an area a quarter of a mile, maybe half a mile, around these communities and structures and, therefore, save them from catastrophic wildfire; that ought to do the trick.

That will not do the trick. In the first place, it is a nice sentiment to try to save small communities and buildings, but that is only part of what we are about here. We are literally about saving the forests themselves, the entire ecosystem, the place where all the flora and fauna live and survive, where the endangered species live. Most of the endangered species do not live right on the edge of the communities.

Why would we not want to create a healthy environment for the endangered species and for the other flora and fauna in the forests? Why would we not want to treat in the middle of the forest rather than just along the roads, by the homes or small communities?

Of course, we want to save them from catastrophic wildfires, but the best way to do that is to treat the entire forest so the fires do not get a big momentum to roll into the communities.

We had the unfortunate experience with the Rodeo-Chediski fire this last summer where the fire was so large and burning so rapidly with such intense heat that it was skipping right over areas that had been treated. While it did not burn those areas, fortunately, because they had been treated, it went on to burn other parts of the forest.

It is no salvation necessarily that we treat a small perimeter around buildings or communities. That is not necessarily going to save them from fire. Even if it does, as I said, we still have not treated the rest of the forest, which is the whole object of returning health to the forest. That is why you cannot just limit this thinning project to the areas immediately surrounding communities. We will have done nothing to save the rest of the forest from insects, disease, mistletoe, and catastrophic wildfire that will destroy the trees and the habitat for the mammals, birds, insects, and the fish that live in the area we want to preserve. That is why it is no answer to say: Let's do treatment in the urban interface area.

There were also attempts to put limits on how many board feet of trees could be removed from these areas—250,000 board feet in an area, for example; I think up to 1 million board feet in an area that had burned. The board feet of timber calculated to exist in the Rodeo-Chediski burned area is 100 million board feet. What was offered was literally a drop in the bucket.

If we are going to salvage the timber that was burned, as the White Mountain Apache Tribe is permitted to do on its part of the forest that was burned, then we are going to have to have special relief because there is no time to do all the studies that are necessary if anybody files an appeal. If they do not file an appeal, then we can salvage that timber, just as the White Mountain Apache Tribe is doing. If someone files an appeal, there is no way to get to the timber before the insects get to it. That is the choice we have. That is why we were so anxious to get something done now instead of waiting.

As I said, it does not appear we have reached a consensus to do that, and that is too bad because as the editorial I just put in the RECORD points out, we do not have time to waste. We have to treat these forests now or they will be subject to burning next year, and, in any event, we will not be able to save them from the diseases that have infected many of the forests today.

If there are others to speak, I will be happy to relinquish the floor to them. In that regard, I suggest the absence of a quorum, but if no one appears thereafter for a minute or two, then I will reclaim the floor and speak some more.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I have checked with the Senator from West Virginia, who has indicated he does not wish to speak at this time, and therefore I will go ahead until one of our colleagues comes.

I want to tell a couple of stories about what I have personally observed in our forests, and it might be of interest to others who perhaps do not have these same kinds of trees in their States.

The country's largest ponderosa pine forest extends through the belt of Arizona that runs literally from the Grand Canyon all the way to New Mexico and then goes on into New Mexico. These trees look a little like the giant sequoias in California. They are not quite as big, but when they reach 300 or 400 years of maturity, they are very large, over 30 inches in diameter. They have a yellow bark with beautiful big canopies, much like the sequoias in California. These are the trees we are all trying to preserve.

I went to an area that was BLM land north of the Grand Canyon after Secretary Bruce Babbitt, then-Secretary of Interior, had authorized a thinning project for that area in the neighborhood of Mount Trumble. Secretary Babbitt was able to do this because, as Secretary of the Interior, he had control over the BLM land, and he basically ordered that it be done, which was a good thing, too, because this is an area with which he was familiar. He had gone hiking throughout the area many times. He knew how desperately the area was in need of this treatment.

So I went up there to see the work that was being done, and the BLM officer said: I have to show you this. Come look. And we drove to an area where it was just as thick as could be, with tiny trees about this size. There must have been thousands per acre. You could hardly wind your way through the forest. None of them was more than 15 or 20 feet high, if that. They were not very pretty. They precluded any grass from growing. There were no animals, obviously, that could wind their way through it. It was a pretty sterile environment, and they were obviously crowding out other kinds of trees that one would have preferred to see grow there.

We came to this huge ponderosa pine, one of the biggest trees I had ever seen other than a redwood or a sequoia. The boughs literally came all the way down to the ground. All around this tree was this brush, these little scrub trees—maybe as tall as I am, maybe a little bit higher—with trunks 3 or 4 inches around. It was literally a tinder box.

This BLM agent said: We have to clear this stuff away immediately. Any spark anywhere near here is going to set off a fire that is going to come all the way through. It is going to run right up the boughs of this tree and destroy this beautiful old tree.

He told me there were many more in this same area, and that is why we had to hurry up and get this area treated.

That is what we are trying to do. We are not going to cut that tree or any other trees that even approximate that size. The object is to clear out all the other stuff so these big beautiful trees can continue to grow in a healthy state, they will not have the competition for air and water and nutrients from all of these little trees, and there will then be grasses reintroduced, the animals can come up, as well as the birds and the butterflies.

All of the studies by Dr. Covington that I mentioned earlier have demonstrated that the species come back within a year. The pitch content of the trees is enhanced significantly, so they are impervious to the bark beetles. The protein content of the grass is increased by an order of magnitude, so the elk and the deer come back. When all of the little mammals come back, then the hawks and the eagles come back, the butterflies begin to pollinate, and all of a sudden there are hundreds of more species of flowers and weeds and grasses than there were before, and there is a park-like condition where there are far fewer trees per acre but it is to the carrying capacity of the land.

So there may only be 150 or 250 trees per acre at that point, but they are all beautiful trees that are going to be healthy and in an environment where the rest of the forests can survive as opposed to the kind of thing about which I was talking.

Now why would people object to doing that? I had a group of environmentalists come into my office, and I asked them: Don't you agree that this is the right science? And they finally said: Yes.

I then said: Why won't you do it?

They said: Well, you do have to have commercial companies come in and do this thinning; right?

I said: Yes, of course.

And they do have to make a profit; right?

And I said: Yes.

And they are not going to work for free. They have to make some money.

I said: You don't object to that, do you?

They said: No, but what we are worried about is that 25, 30, or 40 years after all of this is done and you have treated all of the forests that need to be treated this way, then they will turn their chain saws on the big trees because they will want to save their jobs and save their mills and stay in business, and that is what we are concerned about.

I was dumbfounded at the suggestion that that would actually happen. If all of us who want to save the forests are as concerned in 40 years as we are now—and there is no reason to believe we will not—none of that would ever be permitted to happen. This again falls into the "cut off your nose to spite your face" category. In order to achieve something good, we are going to have the potential of something bad occurring 40 years down the road, a potential that is so small that it is just unthinkable it would ever happen? But because of that little potential in their minds, they are going to prevent us from treating the patient now?

It seems very illogical. It is like saying we are not going to treat the patient's cancer now because the patient will live but eventually the patient is going to die; therefore, there is no point in treating the patient now.

It does not make sense to me, and that is why I think it is a shame we have not been able to reach some kind of agreement on the kind of plan we were talking about that would have limited the amount of acreage that would be treated. It would have limited it to those areas that are so-called class 3 areas, which are the ones most in need of treatment where the danger of catastrophic wildfire is the greatest. We are not even talking about the class 2 or class 1 areas, just class 3.

Within that, it would be further limited in the legislation we have been discussing. We were even willing to limit it to areas of municipal watersheds and urban interface as long as those were broadly enough defined to include the kind of forests we are talking about here, the part of the area that needs to be treated.

None of that was acceptable to those groups that do not want us to treat the forests. As a result, we are going to have another year pass, presumably, unless we are able to do something next spring, where we are subject to these catastrophic wildfires and the forest continues to deteriorate.

At what point, do we finally say, it is worth it to go in and treat these forests? Since there is not enough money in the world to pay AmeriCorps volunteers to go in and do this by one-half acre at a time, we have to have commercial enterprises that are able to go in and take out enough product that they can stay in business. That product can be very small diameter product. It can be poles for construction of cabins. It can be 2-by-4-sized timber. It can be the chipped product that makes fiberboard. In some cases, they may get to medium-sized trees that can actually produce some timber. But if so, why not? If the carrying capacity of the acre is such that some of the trees should be removed, even the so-called medium-sized maybe even 15 or 20 inches in diameter, why wouldn't one do that if what they were leaving were still the very large growth trees we are all talking about protecting?

Senator CRAIG made the offer that at least 10 of the biggest old-growth trees would have to be left. We can probably multiply that and say 100. The bottom line is, those are the trees we are trying to leave. So if the carrying capacity of the land will carry 100, 150, or 200 of those trees, that is how many would be left. Nobody is trying to cut the big beautiful trees down.

In the areas Senator DOMENICI and I represent, it is a dry enough condition in Arizona and New Mexico that we cannot stand many more summers of drought before these forests are going to be all burned up. That is why we have been so disappointed at not being able to get into those forests now and begin this process of taking out the dead and dying timber and cutting out the small-diameter timber that is precluding the rest from growing.

I saw the treatment area we have been experimenting with in Arizona. I saw the results of this thinning, and the species that have come back are just amazing—the birds and the butterflies and the wildflowers. It is incredible what can be done if this is actually permitted to go forward, and so I hope there is a way to do it. I regret we have not been able to find that way yet.

I thank Senator CRAIG and Senator DOMENICI for their work, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BURNS. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I thank Senator KYL, Senator REID, and Senator CRAIG for commenting on the Domenici-Craig amendment, on which the Senator has joined from the very beginning.

I hope everyone will understand this is a very serious situation. We honestly believe there is a compromise that would work, that would prove that we can clean up parts of our forest without in any way damaging the so-called old forest trees, doing it in almost a manicured fashion so long as it is understood what was permitted to do.

It is imperative we send a signal to the American people, not all of whom are in the West. Those in America who saw the fires from a distance know something is wrong. They probably know it got in this condition over many years and will not be fixed tomorrow. They probably concluded we ought to try to fix it.

We are trying to have a year consistent with good rules and good solid approach to management so we can start this process so the users of the forest, and those who recreate, graze cattle, have forests in their backyard, all understand we can begin this cleanup process and move in the right direction so we can start a more major cleanup next year when we try to put new policies into effect to save the forests and not see them go up in flames.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, I know the vote is pending. We all want to see the Interior appropriations bill move on. I have said to Senator REID what we normally do with a second-degree amendment is give it a vote. We certainly would like that vote on our amendment. We think it is appropriate. We think it is within the rules. It is a responsible way to dispose of this issue and move on. I hope we get to that vote. We think it is right. It is appropriate. It is within the rules.

It is important for the Congress and this Senate to speak to the issue of forest health and do so in some form. We think the amendment is adequate in that.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico is on his way and wishes to speak on this matter. The Senator from West Virginia has 22 minutes, and Senator WELLSTONE wishes to speak. We will see what happens.

In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. BINGAMAN.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I appreciate my friend and colleague, Senator BYRD, yielding time.

I will speak briefly about the forests and the fire-thinning proposals and the fire-risk reduction proposals pending in the Senate. One amendment Senator CRAIG proposed is an amendment to the Byrd amendment to the bill. That certainly is a worthy proposal, in many respects. I don't agree with all aspects of it. I have offered an alternative that I think makes more sense. I am glad to go into the detail. I have done that once in the Senate, and I am glad to do it again.

Procedurally, people need to realize there is no reason we should be holding up action on this bill or on the Byrd amendment because of the issue of forest thinning. The forest-thinning proposal Senator CRAIG is offering can be offered as an amendment to the bill. My proposal can be offered as an amendment to the bill. We can get a good debate on those two proposals. I would hope we could come together around a single proposal. We have been working to do that. Either way, there is no reason going forward with the Byrd amendment should be in any way impeded by the need to resolve this forest-thinning issue. We can resolve the forest thinning issue on separate amendments and have the debate appropriate to that.

I believe on the merits what I proposed is a better way to go as an amendment to an appropriations bill because it does not make major changes in the underlying law. It does not make major changes in the authority for Federal courts. For that reason, I hope when we do get to a vote on forest-thinning proposals I will have a chance to persuade my colleagues.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGAMAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. REID. It is also my understanding that under the procedures now before the Senate—regarding the drought assistance measure, which passed by 79 votes—if this vote does not go, that money that we voted to approve for the farms is gone for those who are desperate for the money all over the country; is that true?

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, in response, I agree entirely with the Senator from Nevada. It is very important to Senators on both sides of the aisle for the drought relief assistance to be made available in short order. I hope very much we can move ahead with that.

We can also do this forest thinning issue. I am not suggesting we complete action on this bill absent completion on the forest thinning, but we can do separate amendments. Senator CRAIG can offer his amendment to the bill; I can offer my amendment to the bill. We can have a good debate. Hopefully, we can persuade the Senate on a proposal that makes good sense for everyone and gets the job done.

Mr. REID. Senator WELLSTONE is actually on the subway on his way over.

Mr. DOMENICI. Would the Senator permit me to ask Senator BINGAMAN a question?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to each Senator for that purpose.

Mr. DOMENICI. I wanted to exchange a couple of points with my colleague. I don't know if the Senator had a chance today to read the Santa Fe, NM, editorial about thinning forests.

Mr. BINGAMAN. I did not read that.

Mr. DOMENICI. In this very short time I will try to paraphrase it. They were talking about what a wonderful event it will be for the Santa Fe watershed—which the Senator and I have seen a number of times—when we get around to cleaning it and then thinning it, so that if water or fire would fall on the upper watershed, it would not do violence to the water, which is the long-term lifeblood for the city. I just wondered if the Senator might recognize that when we are finished tonight, if in fact the amendments are no longer in order, or if they are in order, that we will still be left with an issue of whether watersheds are going to be included in this new approach? And, if so, how much of a watershed—how much of that watershed can be done in Western States? Isn't that one of the issues remaining?

Mr. BINGAMAN. In response to my friend and colleague from New Mexico, I agree with him that it is an extremely important part of the issue, as to the thinning debate, what additional authority we provide to the Forest Service to accomplish thinning within watersheds. I have a proposal which I have shown to my colleague that I believe provides ample authority, particularly in the Santa Fe watershed, for them to do everything they would like to do there. I think the earlier proposal Senator CRAIG has will do that same thing, in fact do quite a bit more.

Mr. DOMENICI. Right.

Mr. BINGAMAN. I think it is an important issue for us to get resolved, but I think both proposals do the job with regard to the specific issue that the Senator has raised.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator for yielding the minute. I assume I have 10 seconds left.

Mr. BYRD. I don't like to yield 10 seconds. I yield the Senator an additional minute. Does this Senator wish additional time?

Mr. BINGAMAN. No, thank you.

Mr. DOMENICI. I say to my friend, I hope after this vote, before we finalize this, we might one more time sit and look at this. I think we have narrowed the issue that is most in our minds to be resolved.

I understand you have a proposal in good faith. We have one in good faith. Somehow or another it is assumed by both sides that theirs each will do what will help solve this problem. If we had a little more time, if you could meet with us, it would be greatly appreciated.

I thank Senator BYRD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for this quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WELLSTONE addressed the Chair.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time does the distinguished Senator wish me to yield to him?

Mr. WELLSTONE. I say to my colleague, less than 5 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. Do I have 5 minutes remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 9 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Mr. President, this is really an amendment that has everything in the world to do with whether or not a lot of people in northwestern Minnesota are going to go under economically or not. We had 79 votes to provide this disaster assistance. For northwest Minnesota, this will probably be about $300 million.

There are some who say the administration has shown they understand it is a serious problem because they are going to commit $850 million for drought relief. First, this is a 50 cent fix to a million dollar problem. Second, I don't think taking this small amount of money out of the School Lunch Program and helping people for a couple of weeks is the answer to what has happened around our country—be it fire or be it floods or be it drought.

I was up in northwest Minnesota on Friday. I do not know how I can continue to go back up there and explain to people how it can be that week after week this is being blocked. As far as I am concerned, we can have up-or-down votes on all these amendments. That is my own view. But I say to my colleagues, I implore them, I beg you, let's break this traffic jam and let's have the votes and let's move this forward.

Really, time is not neutral for so many of the independent producers and the farmers in northwest Minnesota. The FEMA assistance has been great, but it is not going to help them. There has been massive damage to cropland. Crop insurance comes nowhere near covering it. We have had this ridiculous debate about how it is going to come out of the farm programs. It is not going to happen. CBO won't score it that way. But close to $6 billion nationally will not be additional money we are going to spend on the farm program because prices are up. But for the farmers in northwest Minnesota and the producers in northwest Minnesota, they have no production.

For me as a Senator, this is the priority. It is just impossible to meet with people—without sounding melodramatic—to just look at their eyes and know what they are going through and explain how, once again, this is being blocked or filibustered. I know we are not going to win on this vote, but I urge colleagues to please vote for cloture. It would make a huge difference to a lot of really honest, hard-working, salt of the Earth people in northwest Minnesota.

I yield the floor.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, with the consent of the managers, I ask the time be yielded back so we can vote.

Mr. BYRD. I yield my time remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. Under the previous order, the question is on agreeing to the motion to table amendment No. 4522. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. REID. I announce that the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KERRY), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. TORRICELLI) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KERRY) would vote "Aye".

Mr. NICKLES. I announce that the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI) and the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. HUTCHINSON) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAYTON). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

THE VISIT OF ASKAR AKAEV, PRESIDENT OF THE KYRGYZ REPUBLIC

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize the visit of the President of the Kyrgyz Republic, Askar Akaev, to the United States from September 19–24, 2002. President Akaev is here at the invitation of President Bush.

While in Washington, the President of the Kyrgyz Republic scheduled meetings with President George W. Bush, Vice President RICHARD CHENEY, Secretary of State Colin Powell, and Secretary of Agriculture Ann Veneman. In addition, meetings at the United States Capitol with the Speaker of the House of Representatives DENNIS HASTERT, Senate Republican Leader TRENT LOTT, and other leaders of the Senate who have expressed an interest in Central Asia affairs were on his calendar.

During his visit to New York, President Akaev addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations and met with Secretary General Kofi Annan. He also participated in a round table discussion with members of the business community.

The tragic events of September 11, 2001 redefined the importance of the Kyrgyz Republic's critical location in Central Asia. It has a major role in the region's political and security framework. As an ally of the United States in central Asia, the Kyrgyz Republic opened its territory to approximately 3000 coalition troops at the height of United States operations in Afghanistan. It is significant that the coalition forces were allowed to deploy military personnel in Manas airport in the capitol city of Bishkek. Kyrgyzstan remains a host to a significant number of troops, as well as aircraft and technical support. The new political landscape created by these deployments has altered the Kyrgyz Republic's relations with its regional powers, Russia and China.

At the same time, the Kyrgyz Republic is pressing ahead with economic reforms. The European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, one of the international financial institutions active in the region, concluded last year that Kyrgyzstan has successfully completed its economic structural reform program. Kyrgyzstan was the region's first nation to secure membership in the World Trade Organization, in 1998, and the first nation of the Commonwealth of Independent States to receive permanent normal trade relations with the United States.

Kyrgyzstan has committed itself to a free trade model and has implemented many new initiatives through a dramatic reform of its trade, tax, and intellectual property laws. The Kyrgyz Republic was also the first country in the region to introduce a fully convertible currency, and has consistently led the way in market reforms.

As a result of the tragedy on the south of Kyrgyzstan, he has also reconstituted the government to include representatives of several groups previously in opposition and has organized a Constitutional Council, also filled with opposition-minded figures, to provide further opportunities for power changing. The nation now faces its first transition of power since independence. President Akaev and his government are determined to see that this transition occurs through an election process that builds and legitimizes democratic institutions.

President Askar Akaev was born on November 10, 1944 in the village of Kyzyl-Bairak, Kemin district of Kyrgyzstan in a family of farmers. In 1961, he finished secondary school with a Gold Medal. He graduated with honors from Leningrad Fine Mechanics and Optics Institute in 1967 and pursued his studies to become a Doctor of Science.

Dr. Akaev started his career in 1961 as a mechanic worker. He held other positions as an engineer, senior lecturer, professor, and finally the Head of the Computer Sciences Department in Frunze Polytechnical Institute, now Bishkek Technical University.

In 1984, Askar Akaev was elected a correspondent member of the Academy of Sciences of Kyrgyzstan, at the same year he became an academician. In 1986, he was appointed Head of the Department of Science and Higher Academic Institutions, Kyrgyz Communist Party's Central Committee. From 1987 until 1989, he served as the Vice President at the Kyrgyz Academy of Sciences and later became its President. In 1989, Askar Akaev was elected as a Deputy of the Supreme Council of the USSR.

On October 27, 1990, the Parliament of Kyrgyzstan elected Askar Akaev as the President of the Kyrgyz Soviet Socialist Republic. At the nationwide elections on October 12, 1991, he was elected as the First President of independent nation of Kyrgyzstan. The people of Kyrgyzstan confirmed Akaev's powers at the national referendum on January 30, 1994. On December 24, 1995 the President of the Kyrgyz Republic Askar Akaev was re-elected. President Akaev announced that he will not seek reelection when his term ends in 2005.

The President's spouse, Mairam Akeva, is a professor of Science on Machine Dynamics and is the head of the International Charitable Foundation of Childhood and Maternity Support. Established in 1993, this organization assists women and children with different forms of pulmonary and bronchial diseases.

The Kyrgyz Republic is situated in the middle of Central Asia, at the crossroads of culture and civilizations, at the branch of the legendary Silk Road. In 1999, President Akaev authored a report called "The Diplomacy of the Silk Road." His article remains timely today, given the changes that have taken place in central Asia since September 11, 2001.

In conclusion, many commodities were traded on the Silk Road which stretched 5000 miles from east to west. One very important "commodity" in this new century is friendship. Today, the United States has a good ally and friend in that region of the world. Kyrgyzstan is indeed a partner for peace and stability in Central Asia. In this regard, I wish to congratulate President Akaev on his successful visit to the United States and wish him well with all future endeavors.

I ask unanimous consent to print the article to which I referred in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DIPLOMACY OF THE SILK ROAD

(By Askar Akaev)

THE PAST AND PRESENT OF THE GREAT SILK ROAD

The Great Silk Road, which in ancient times joined East with West, and to some extent North with South, by means of trade and economic, cultural-humanitarian and also political and diplomatic ties, has a history stretching back several thousand years. At various phases of its existence the content and significance, directions and scale of contacts varied, but one thing remained unchanged: throughout that long period, the Great Silk Road played the role of a connecting bridge between countries and civilizations.

It served as a channel for trade, which became the catalyst for the development of crafts. Travelers and explorers studied the countries and peoples of the lands along the entire length of the Road, thus making an enormous contribution to the development of knowledge.

The world became acquainted with the ideas and work of the greatest philosophers, scholars and statesmen. Intensive mutual enrichment of cultures took place, and there was an active exchange of knowledge and of spiritual and philosophical concepts and views. Thanks to the Road, outstanding epics and legends became the property of all mankind.

Via the Great Silk Road, syncretic and monotheistic religious ideas were disseminated. Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, Judaism, Islam and Christianity all found their adherents along the Great Silk Road.

The Great Silk Road was also of immeasurable significance in the establishment and maintenance of diplomatic relations among the centers of political life, the major States of Europe and Asia. Many historical sources bear witness to the active nature and high level of official contacts and the exchange of diplomatic missions, particularly between Byzantium and China, powers which played a significant role in the International life of that era.

The intensive and multidirectional process of Inter-civilizational communication on various levels went on for centuries.

Despite a number of changes of direction, by the will of historical fate the main arteries of the Great Silk Road passed through the territory of Kyrgyzstan.

On the eve of the new third millennium, the idea of a revival of the Great Silk Road has met with broad international support and an extremely warm response, largely as a result of the existence of two interdependent trends that characterize the development of the modern world.

The first of these involves the steady intensification of the processes of interdependence and globalization, the phenomenally rapid development and introduction of the latest technologies, communication systems and computer networks and the acceleration on an unprecedented scale of information and capital flows that "erode" national boundaries.

The second trend reflects the high level of integration at the regional and subregional levels.

The current steady and dynamic development of political, trade and economic relations would be unthinkable without the strengthening of fraternal, trusting and mutually advantageous relations of partnership between all States of the Silk Road region.

The geography of the Great Silk Road has no bounds or limitations. Its expansion by those countries which intend to develop cooperation with the countries in the Great Silk Road region is naturally and objectively determined by the entire course of historical development.

The arms race, local conflicts, extremism and terrorism, the unlawful manufacture, distribution and consumption of narcotic substances, natural disasters and those brought about by technology or by man, and crying social needs are problems that lead to recognition of the natural and objective need for a revival of the Great Silk Road on a qualitatively new basis.

While in the past the Great Silk Road played the role of a connecting bridge, now, in a situation of globalization, the destiny of the Road extends far beyond the framework of this dimension alone. The cosmic and the planetary appear as a single whole, implying an organic combination of present-day progress with the development of human civilization itself.

The renaissance of the Great Silk Road under the new historical circumstances refutes the ideas that were current in the past, which at times artificially contrasted the ways in which the East and the West perceived and viewed the world as totally incompatible with one another. Fortunately, ideas of planet-wide significance and scale are now predominant in the minds and hearts of the peoples, inhabiting the region of the Road.

The ideas of humanism, tolerance and the revival of spirituality are gaining ground in their tenacious struggle against age-old prejudices and intolerance of different ways of thinking.

Kyrgyzstan, lying at the very center of the Eurasian continent, at the junction of several civilizations, having taken in and absorbed a multiplicity of cultures and ways of looking at the world, possesses under present circumstances the necessary prerequisites for becoming a bridge of friendship and cooperation between all the countries within the Great Silk Road.

KYRGYZSTAN—AN INSEPARABLE PART OF THE GREAT SILK ROAD THE COUNTRY KNOWN AS "KYRGYZSTAN"

After regaining its State independence, Kyrgyzstan set out on, a qualitatively new road of its development, the road of political and socio-economic transformations.

Such concepts as "democratization", "civil freedoms" and "supremacy of the law" have become firmly embedded in everyday practice. The principle of separation of powers and the system of "checks and balances" in the interrelations between them have clearly demonstrated their effectiveness.

Favourable conditions have been created for encouraging initiatives and activity by citizens at the local level and for the comprehensive development of local self-government as the foundation for the life of the State.

The idea of "Kyrgyzstan—our common home" has become the recognized basis for enhancing and strengthening inter-ethnic harmony and creating the conditions for a life in dignity for all citizens of the country. In Kyrgyzstan, which has absorbed in equal measure the spiritual heritage and rich traditions of the East and the West, representatives of many ethnic groups and religious faiths live together in peace and harmony.

Kyrgyzstan has created the conditions for the establishment of an open society with a developed market economy, successfully solved the problem of macroeconomic stabilization and entered the stage of economic growth.

A national information structure is being created in Kyrgyzstan with access to worldwide computer networks.

Currently, the most important goals facing society as a whole are to intensify the positive trends in the economy and make them stable, to encourage and support national entrepreneurship, especially on the part of small and medium-sized businesses, to attract direct investment and to make extensive use of new technology.

An attractive investment climate has been created in Kyrgyzstan, and a legislative base has been established which affords foreign investors the necessary guarantees and privileges.

The stable political system and the open and democratic nature of Kyrgyzstan's economy create favorable conditions for the development of mutually advantageous international cooperation.

Kyrgyzstan has entered the era of democracy and renewal.

KYRGYZSTAN AND THE COUNTRIES OF THE GREAT SILK ROAD REGION

The conception of Kyrgyzstan's foreign policy with regard to bilateral cooperation excludes in principle the use of the prefix "anti-". This is the outcome of the entire course of Kyrgyzstan's historical development as an independent State and of the fact that our country pursues a peace-loving foreign policy and builds its relations with the outside world on the basis of the universally accepted principles and norms of international law.

Kyrgyzstan, as a consistent advocate of broad and multifaceted international cooperation for the joint solution of global international problems, takes up "anti-drug", "anti-extremism" and "anti-terrorism" positions. It is an implacable opponent of unlawful arms trading and distribution of arms and strives to achieve stability, progress and economic stability not only in the region, but throughout the world.

Our country is deeply convinced that along the entire length of the modern-day Great Silk Road, no serious problems or contradictions of an antagonistic nature are to be found between the countries falling within its orbit.

Among the participants in international relations, awareness is growing of the need to resolve chronic problems by peaceful means, at the negotiating table. In this connection, the example of Tajikistan, whose history is inseparable from the history of the Great Silk Road, is instructive. The political will and desire to seek compromise and mutually acceptable solutions that have been demonstrated by the leaders of the parties that were previously in conflict, combined with the mediating efforts and good will of neighbouring countries, including Kyrgyzstan, give grounds for hoping that the processes of peace and national reconciliation in that country are irreversible.

Kyrgyzstan's initiative in relation to the conduct of a peace conference on Afghanistan has been widely acknowledged. The joint efforts and cooperation of all the countries falling within the orbit of the Great Silk Road can and must lead to the long-awaited peace in that long-suffering land and turn forever a somber page in the history of the region.

The creation of a nuclear-weapon-free zone in Central Asia, cessation of the arms race and the conversion of military production, and the creation of conditions for the stable development of all countries of the Great Silk Road without exception afford grounds for assuming that at the beginning of the third millennium the region of the Road, which possesses vast potential and resources, will become one of the most flourishing and prosperous in the world, in that problems affecting the interests of all the countries will be resolved jointly and all obstacles to the free movement of goods, capital, services and manpower along the entire length of the Road will be removed.

Kyrgyzstan is making purposeful efforts to develop cooperation with all the countries of the Great Silk Road region. In view of its geographical location, our country has a favorable opportunity of simultaneously developing fruitful relations in such directions as "Kyrgyzstan—neighbouring countries", "Kyrgyzstan—Europe" and "Kyrgyzstan—East and South-East Asia".

"Kyrgyzstan—neighbouring countries"—our country is working steadily to intensify various forms of cooperation with neighbouring countries and to expand political, trade and economic and cultural and humanitarian relations. The existence of common historical, political, economic and cultural and humanitarian links with countries which in the past formed a single whole necessitates the maintenance and development of relations through bilateral and multilateral cooperation. Kyrgyzstan is attentively following the dynamics of and collectively participating in the multilateral integration processes in countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States, and making its contribution to the strengthening and intensification of regional and subregional integration.

Acknowledging the important role of a favorable external environment for subsequent development, Kyrgyzstan is working consistently and fruitfully to strengthen security along the State borders with all neighbouring countries. Together with other countries of the region, it has signed a number of important agreements aimed at strengthening confidence-building measures in the military sphere and reducing the armed forces in the border region, and this has made it possible to settle almost completely the border disputes that still remain from the past.

Kyrgyzstan is geographically and historically close to the Muslim States of the Great Silk Road region, which possess considerable investment, industrial and raw material potential.

"Kyrgyzstan—Europe"—The significance of this direction for Kyrgyzstan is determined by the following main factors: the need for and benefits of cooperation with developed European countries; the desirability of further developing links with the Eastern European States; and participation in the European affairs of the states bordering on Kyrgyzstan. In developing its relations with European countries, Kyrgyzstan will, alongside efforts on the bilateral level, step up its activity in the field of multilateral diplomacy, taking advantage of the unique opportunity to participate in the work of the European institutions dealing with issues of security (including in the Central Asian region), economic cooperation and the development of democratic institutions.

"Kyrgyzstan—South and South-East Asia"—Kyrgyzstan's cooperation with the countries of East and South-East Asia is conducted both on the bilateral level and through international organizations. Despite the financial and economic difficulties some Asian countries have recently been experiencing, their economic potential will play a growing role in the international arena.

Taking into account the South-East Asia countries' great wealth of experience of activity, Kyrgyzstan will in future show great interest in participating actively in various regional forums of the Association of South-East Asian Nations, and also in the establishment of cooperation on a regional basis.

States are prompted by their national interests, set in the context of geostrategic and geopolitical realities. In this connection, Kyrgyzstan can succeed in developing relations with all the countries of the Great Silk Road region, bearing in mind the following factors:

(a) In terms of economic indicators, Kyrgyzstan falls into the category of "developing countries" as used in international practice. This enables it to be a full participant in the leading organs of multilateral diplomacy of the countries of the South and defend their international economic and political interests collectively;

(b) Kyrgyzstan, as a country with a transition economy, is entitled to count on the cooperation of the developed countries and international financial and economic organizations in conducting its policy of reforms;

(c) Kyrgyzstan also forms part of the group of land-locked countries. Located at the very center of East-West and North-South transport and communication routes, it feels a natural need to link up with modem communication systems and ensure reliable access to maritime transport, and is also aware of the objective need to become a transit country. It is therefore working actively to develop all forms of communications, in particular transport and information, in the interests of all the Great Silk Road countries.

PRINCIPLES OF COOPERATION AND ESTABLISHMENT OF THE BASIS FOR RELATIONS WITH THE GREAT SILK ROAD COUNTRIES

Equitable partnership, friendship and cooperation with:
All Great Silk Road countries;
Interdependence;
Mutual advantage;
The long-term perspective;
Multifaceted development of international cooperation.

Equitable partnership, friendship and cooperation with all Great Silk Road countries are the most important components of a principle which is objective and universal in nature, relating equally to the hopes and aspirations of any country interested in creating a favorable environment along its national borders and in the content of bilateral and multilateral diplomacy. This principle is in full conformity with the universally acknowledged principles and norms of international law as laid down in the Charter of the United Nations, including mutual respect for sovereignty, territorial integrity and inviolability of borders, non-interference in internal affairs, non-use of force, settlement of conflicts by peaceful means and equal and mutually advantageous cooperation.

Interdependence has become a completely new phenomenon of the end of the twentieth century. Globalization has led to an awareness of the unarguable fact that no country, however powerful it may be in military and economic terms, can face alone the challenges that call in question the survival of the whole of mankind.

The principle of mutual advantage is sufficiently obvious. The development of mutually advantageous international cooperation within the Great Silk Road region will allow all countries without exception to find answers to many questions and solve the problems they are at present contending with. The countries of the region are actively striving to create new and diversify existing transportation systems so as to ensure the shortest and best means of access to world communications; they are encouraging and developing international trade, both within the region and outside it; and they are intensifying and stepping up cultural and humanitarian, scientific and educational and tourism contacts between the nationals of all the countries of the region.

The principle of the long-term perspective is inseparably interrelated with the preceding principle. The entire historical experience of the development both of the Great Silk Road itself and of the countries drawn into its orbit over the course of many centuries, has convincingly demonstrated the importance of and vital need for the development of inter-State relations that address the long-term perspective.

Multifaceted development of international cooperation is a necessary condition for the creation of favorable prerequisites and possibilities for the conduct of a balanced, flexible and maneuverable policy on the international arena; it corresponds to Kyrgyzstan's long-term national interests and is determined by the entire complex of problems and issues that need to be solved in the future.

PROSPECTS FOR THE APPLICATION OF THE "GREAT SILK ROAD" FOREIGN POLICY CONCEPT

The application of "Great Silk Road" diplomacy will have favorable long-term consequences for Kyrgyzstan and for all the other countries located in the Great Silk Road region.

The revival of the Great Silk Road at this juncture will make it possible to create all the necessary conditions for the transformation of the region into an area of stability, security, friendship, cooperation and equitable partnership.

The present-day Great Silk Road creates favorable prerequisites for the intensification of international cooperation in the joint solution of the global problems facing mankind on the threshold of the third millennium.

The expansion of the geography of the Great Silk Road will make it possible to make fuller use of the existing opportunities and rich potential for intensifying international trade and economic, cultural and humanitarian, scientific and technical and tourist contacts between all countries and peoples. There are sufficient grounds for thinking that all the Great Silk Road countries will make the maximum efforts to ensure that in the new millennium there emerge from the Road region, which constitutes a vast space crossing the entire Eurasian continent from East to West and uniting a diversity of cultures, traditions and historical fates, only positive impulses of solidarity, peace, progress and prosperity.

Kyrgyzstan is ready and able to act as a binding link between all the Great Silk Road countries.

For Kyrgyzstan, the interests and objectives of its foreign policy consist in ensuring to the fullest possible extent the strengthening, by political and diplomatic means, of international guarantees of its independence, sovereignty, economic self-sufficiency and territorial integrity.

To achieve these goals and objectives, Kyrgyzstan is full of resolve and will to comprehensively encourage and develop friendly, good-neighbourly relations of partnership with all the countries of the Great Silk Road region and to participate consistently and concretely in integration processes.—Askar Akaev, President of Kyrgyzstan.

DECISION ON IRAQ

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, I want to have printed in the RECORD an op-ed by columnist Charles Krauthammer discussing the United Nations and its debate over how to deal with Iraq. Mr. Krauthammer makes the point that nations are driven by their own self-interests; thus, members of the U.N. Security Council—such as France, Russia, and China—all have varied perspectives on a potential confrontation with Iraq.

He argues that it is not "unseemly" for the United States to similarly act in the name of its own interests. And that it is, in his words, an "absurdity" to suggest that the U.S. is suddenly granted "moral legitimacy" by U.N. Security Council approval for its actions, since the Security Council itself is composed of member states acting in their own self interests.

I ask unanimous consent the op-ed by Mr. Krauthammer be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS THIS THE WAY TO DECIDE ON IRAQ?

(By Charles Krauthammer)

There is something deeply deranged about the Iraq debate.

The vice president, followed by the administration A Team and echoing the president, argues that we must remove from power an irrational dictator who has a history of aggression and mass murder, is driven by hatred of America and is developing weapons of mass destruction that could kill millions of Americans in a day. The Democrats respond with public skepticism, a raised eyebrow and the charge that the administration has yet to "make the case."

Then on Sept. 12, the president goes to the United Nations and argues that this same dictator must be brought to heel to vindicate some Security Council resolutions and thus rescue the United Nations from irrelevance. The Democrats swoon. "Great speech," they say. "Why didn't you say that in the first place? Count us in."

When the case for war is made purely in terms of American national interest—in terms of the safety, security and very lives of American citizens—chins are pulled as the Democrats think it over. But when the case is the abstraction of being the good international citizen and strengthening the House of Kofi, the Democrats are ready to parachute into Baghdad.

This hierarchy of values is bizarre but not new. Liberal internationalism—the foreign policy school of the modern Democratic Party (and of American liberalism more generally)—is deeply suspicious of actions taken for reasons of naked interest. After all, this is the party that in the last decade voted overwhelmingly against the Persian Gulf War, where vital American interests were at stake (among them, keeping the world's largest reservoir of oil out of the hands of a hostile dictator), while supporting humanitarian military interventions in Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia and Kosovo, places with only the remotest connection to American security interests.

This is all sweet and nice. And highly, flatteringly moral. But is this the way to decide when to risk the lives of brave young Americans?

This fawning over the president's rescue-the-U.N. rationale is not just sentimental, it is illogical. Assume—big assumption—that the United Nations does act and passes a resolution magnanimously allowing Americans to fight and die in Iraq. How does that rescue the United Nations from irrelevance? Under a feckless U.S. administration that allowed things to drift, the United Nations sat on its hands through the 1990s and did nothing. If not for this American president who threatens to invade on his own if he has to, the United Nations would still be doing nothing. The United Nations is irrelevant one way or the other. It is acting now only because of American pressure. It will go back to sleep tomorrow when America eases that pressure.

And what is the moral logic underlying the Democrats' demand for U.N. sanctions? The country's top Democrat, Sen. Tom Daschle, said that U.N. support "will be a central factor in how quickly Congress acts. If the international community supports it, if we can get the information we've been seeking, then I think we can move to a [Senate] resolution."

Daschle's insistence on the centrality of a U.N. stamp of approval is puzzling. How does this work? In what way does the approval of the Security Council confer moral legitimacy on this enterprise? Perhaps Daschle can explain how the blessing of the butchers of Tiananmen Square, who hold the Chinese seat on the Security Council, lends moral authority to an invasion of Iraq. Or the support of the Kremlin, whose central interest in Iraq is the $8 billion that it owes Russia.

Or the French. There can be no Security Council approval without them. Does Daschle imagine that their approval will hinge on humanitarian calculations? If the French come on board it will be because they see an Anglo-American train headed for Baghdad and they don't want to be left at the station. The last time the Middle East was carved up was 1916, when a couple of British and French civil servants, a Mr. Sykes and a Mr. Picot, drew lines on a map of the crumbling Ottoman Empire. Among other goodies, France got Syria and Lebanon. Britain got Iraq. The French might not relish being shut out of Iraq a second time.

My point is not to blame France or China or Russia for acting in their national interests. That's what nations do. That's what nations' leaders are supposed to do. My point is to express wonder at Americans who find it unseemly to act in the name of their own national interests and who cannot see the logical absurdity of granting moral legitimacy to American action only if it earns the approval of the Security Council—approval granted or withheld on the most cynical ground of self-interest.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY in March of last year. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a terrible crime that occurred August 19, 2000 in Los Altos, CA. A gay man and his friend were assaulted outside a hair salon. The assailant, Peter Ellsworth, used anti-gay epithets during the attack. Mr. Ellsworth has been charged in connection with the incident.

I believe that Government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

ANGELS IN ADOPTION

• Mrs. CARNAHAN. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the individuals, organizations, and families who open their hearts to adoptive children. Children around the world, in Cambodia, in Romania, and in our own country wait desperately for families to care and provide for them. The parents who adopt these needy children turn their lives around and offer them a brighter future filled with love and hope.

As a member of the Congressional Coalition on Adoption, I would like to recognize the efforts of parents, adoption agencies, support groups and other individuals whose dedication to adoption makes a difference in the lives of children. Adoption provides countless children with stable homes, caring families and loving supportive parents. In particular, I would like to honor Dennis and Debbie Sparrow of Saint Louis, Missouri. This year, I have nominated the Sparrows as "Angels in Adoption" for their hard work and dedication to adoptive children from Romania. The "Angels in Adoption" award is presented by the Congressional Coalition on Adoption to recognize those who enrich the lives of adoptive children.

Dennis and Debbie Sparrow adopted their first child from Romania in 1991. During the adoption process, the Sparrows saw firsthand how many of the children in orphanages are destined for a life of poverty and hardship. Upon their return, Dennis and Debbie started two organizations to benefit the children they saw in Romania. S.E.E.K., Save Eastern Europe's Kids, collects donations for Romanian orphans and their caregivers. S.E.E.K. International, a non-profit adoption agency, assists prospective parents and children through the adoption process. In addition to helping over 100 children find loving homes, the Sparrows have personally adopted five children.

The Sparrows' exemplary work demonstrates that individuals can make a great difference. They have provided invaluable resources and support to other families wishing to bring Romanian children into their lives. They have raised money to assist in the care of these children. They have established two adoption placement centers in Romania. Moreover, they have inspired others to open their hearts and homes to the orphaned children of Romania.

I want to applaud Dennis and Debbie Sparrow for their devotion to helping adoptive parents and children. These "Angels in Adoption" have not only made a difference in hundreds of young lives, but they have also raised the awareness of the benefits of adoption. The hard work of these angels is an inspiration to others and a blessing to the children whose lives they have touched.•

CONGRATULATIONS ON THE 95TH ANNIVERSARY OF UPS

• Mr. CLELAND. Mr. President, today I congratulate United Parcel Service on the occasion of its 95th anniversary, and to ask my distinguished colleagues to join me in recognizing the accomplishments of one of the Nation's most successful companies, a company that employs more than 371,000 men and women worldwide.

UPS was founded on August 28, 1907, in a small office under a sidewalk in Seattle, WA, where founder Jim Casey started what has become the largest transportation company in the world. Now headquartered in Atlanta, GA, UPS is considered the world leader in package delivery, and has been recognized for 4 straight years as the "World's Most Admired Delivery Company" by Fortune magazine.

Customers around the globe rely on UPS to ship nearly 13 million packages a day, creating a volume of 3.4 billion packages annually. UPS.com is one of the busiest websites on the Internet, allowing customers to enhance the customer service and efficiency of their e-commerce.

And UPS employees are among the best in the business, a result of working in an environment that enables growth and opportunity. In return, UPSers provide countless hours of volunteerism to organizations such as the United Way. In fact, last year alone, employees donated more than $50 million to the United Way, more than any corporation in the 115-year history of the United Way.

The true spirit of UPS is shown in the legacy carried out by its employees over the last 95 years. UPS is an example of what's right in corporate America today, and I am proud to congratulate them on 95 years of exemplary service.•

WELCOMING BOETTGER BABY

• Mr. CRAPO. Mr. President, I rise today to announce the birth of a fine young lady, Emily Copeland Boettger. Emily is the first child of Scott and Sally Boettger, and was born on May 8, 2002. Scott and Sally live in Hailey, ID, and are active in natural resources and environmental issues in the State. Scott serves as the Executive Directory of the Wood River Land Trust, and Sally serves as the Director of Development of The Nature Conservancy in Idaho. I have spent time in the Boettger's home and enjoyed their expertise and experience in outdoor activities. I'm happy to report that mother, father, and baby are doing well, although Scott and Sally are probably getting used to fewer hours of sleep.

Emily is the granddaughter of Cherry and William F. Gillespie, III, of Wilmington, DE, and Doug and Gail Boettger of Spring City, PA. I know they join with me in sending best wishes and welcome greetings to young Emily.

It is always a joyous event to bring a new family member into the world. Emily has been much-anticipated and has held a place in the hearts of her parents and family for many months now as they have awaited her arrival. As the father of five myself, I know that Scott and Sally are in for a most remarkable, frustrating, rewarding, and exciting experience of their lives. Emily will make certain of that. Our best wishes go out to the Boettger family on this most auspicious occasion.•

IN MEMORY OF IRA YELLIN

• Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I would like to take this moment to reflect on the rich life and legacy of an exceptional Los Angeles leader and friend, Ira Yellin.

Ira died of cancer on September 10, 2002, of complications from lung cancer at his home in Santa Monica Canyon. He was 62 years old. This was a sad day for so many people throughout California, whose lives were touched by Ira's unyielding commitment to making our community a more beautiful and better place to live.

Although a strong supporter of many civic organizations, Ira was most well-known for his extraordinary dedication to restoration of several of Los Angeles's historic gems. While eating at Grand Central Market, waiting for a train at Union Station or admiring the beautiful restoration of City Hall, we have Ira to thank for helping to restore and maintain these wonderful places. Those who have visited Los Angeles' recently dedicated Catholic Cathedral of Our Lady of Angels may also thank Ira, for playing a role in its design.

Born in 1940 near Boston, MA, and raised in Van Nuys, CA, Ira often visited downtown Los Angeles with his father, who instilled in his son the passion for city life and the importance of making the world a better place. Years later, Ira attended Princeton University and Harvard Law School, and returned to California where he received a master's degree in law from the University of California, Berkeley. After he finished his studies, he spent a year in the Marines before settling in Los Angeles.

In 1967, Ira worked as a lawyer at a Beverly Hills firm while helping to run a non-profit legal advocacy organization. Then, in 1975, he left the firm to work in real estate development and management, overseeing building projects throughout California and on Los Angeles' Westside. However, Ira realized he was more drawn to downtown buildings in need of restoration than the state-of-the-art buildings on Los Angeles' affluent Westside. In 1985, Ira began his own real estate firm and dedicated his life to the revival of buildings throughout Los Angeles.

Ira's passion for turning neglected buildings into treasures for the community made him a great asset to Los Angeles. His dedication to community service benefitted many cultural and civic organizations. Ira was active with the Skirball Cultural Center, the J. Paul Getty Trust and served as past president of the American Jewish Committee.

I will miss Ira Yellin. Until the very end, he pursued his vision and turned dreams into realities. Although his presence will be greatly missed, his wonderful work will be long remembered for generations to come.•

ON THE WORK OF ATF SPECIAL AGENT JOHN CARR, 2002 MEDAL OF VALOR RECIPIENT

• Mrs. BOXER. Mr. President, I am proud today to recognize the courage of Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, ATF, Special Agent John Carr, who was recently honored with the Federal Bar Association's, FBA, distinguished 2002 Medal of Valor Award in Los Angeles. For the past 13 years, the FBA has presented the award to federal employees who demonstrate outstanding service in their field of work.

Special Agent Carr earned his award for working undercover to catch violent gang members staging a series of home invasion robberies. Carr transformed his look, acquainted himself with the criminals, and pretended to help them in their operation. Carr gave the criminals false information, which led them to traps planned by the ATF. Thanks to Carr's work, many dangerous criminals were caught and taken off our streets.

John Carr risked his life working on this assignment. There are not many people who would make such a great sacrifice for others to feel safe in their homes. Through his courage, bravery and steadfast dedication, Carr prevailed in the face of danger. I extend my sincere congratulations to John Carr on this honor, and thank him for his great work.•

CONGRATULATIONS TO NICK COSMA

• Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise today to offer my most sincere words of support and encouragement to Mr. Nick Cosma. Today Nick will stand and take his oath to become a citizen of the United States.

I believe it is particularly important during such times as these to reflect upon the dream that America represents to so many people like Nick around the world. A strong family, an adventurer's spirit and a solid character are essential ingredients to brave the challenges of an unknown land. While it certainly isn't an easy task to come from afar and try to make a better life in the United States, people continually come to these shores in search of opportunity, freedom and personal liberty. America is a country full of opportunity for those who are willing to work hard. Nick's hard work and dedication has brought him through our legal process to a junction where he can call himself an American.

Today Nick will have earned all of the rights and responsibilities that come with citizenship. I know this is a proud day for Nick and his wife Abra and their family and friends. As I understand, Nick has already been shopping for a fireproof safe to house his new American passport. It is apparent that Nick is already taking his new responsibilities seriously.

So with that, I offer congratulations to Nick Cosma and his family on his day of becoming a citizen.●

TRIBUTE TO ODILE GROGAN

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following tribute by my nephew, Joseph P. Kennedy II, be printed in the RECORD in honor of Odile Grogan, a dear friend of all of the Kennedy family.

The tribute follows:

TRIBUTE TO ODILE GROGAN

(By Joseph P. Kennedy II)

More than 20 years ago, my good friend Rick Grogan had the great fortune of meeting a savvy and stylish Parisian, Odile Claude Emelie Basch, who was working in New York City, running programs in support of the arts.

The timing was perfect. Rick, turning his sights to a career in international business, found a companion conversant in languages, accustomed to travel, and filled with the same spirit of adventure that has always animated his life.

Before meeting Rick, Odile's consuming passion was the arts.

The Gallic phase of her arts education took place in the Left Bank of Paris, renowned as a world center of culture. She attended the Ecole Alsacienne, located near the Montparnasse cafés frequented by artists and writers for over a century. Her talents were then nurtured at the Lycee Fenelon in the Quartier Saint Germain-des-Pres, just a few yards from Pablo Picasso's former atelier on Rue des Grandos Augustins.

After receiving the Baccalaureate, she took up studies at the arts-intensive Finch College in New York City, whose students have ranged the artistic gamut from Grace Slick to Isabella Rossellini.

She went on to receive an M.A. in art history from Queens College and subsequently applied both her management and art history skills directing visual and performing arts partron programs under Phillip Morris's legendary chairman, Joseph F. Cullman III. Her guidance led to innovative partnerships between the company and such institutions as the Whitney Museum, which opened a branch in the company's newly built headquarters.

It was during her tenure at Phillip Morris that Odile walked onto the canvas of Rick Grogan's life.

In Odile, he found someone at ease in every facet of conversation, with views as varied and forceful as his own. Whether discussing politics, cuisine, painting, or education, Odile proved not just a font of opinions and facts but a master of epithets and one-liners, in two tongues, no less.

Just out of Harvard Business School, Rick married Odile in 1981 and they moved to London, where Rick worked as a consultant for Bain Company. Rick thought they might spend a year or two in England before returning to the U.S.

Odile thought otherwise. As a tribute to her powers of persuasion, she convinced her deal-maker husband that London was just the right place for the family, conveniently located between France and America.

Rick bought the argument if not the logic and so they settled into life in England, their lives soon graced by Alexandra, Nicholas, and Charlotte, wonderfully gifted children who feel at home anywhere from Harvard Square to Picadily Circus to Place de la Concorde.

In spite of all her household demands, Odile never neglected to devote time and energy to her beloved arts. A benefactor of the Serpentine Gallery in London's Kensington Gardens, she has encouraged policies to bring a wider public into museums, using the arts to uplift and liberate the human spirit across broader demographics.

Her cultivated judgment has also been sought by the Tate Museum, where she serves on the acquisition committee.

Several years ago, the enviable rhythms of the Grogans' family life were interrupted by a cycling accident in the French countryside. Rick lay near death in a coma.

Odile, at his side every moment, took full charge of his medical care and recovery. "He is my husband," she declared. "I can take care of him."

And so she did, sitting long hours by his hospital bed, watching for this eyes to open and recognition to light up his expression. With her help and the force of her spirit, Rick did awaken and recover.

The mishap was an awful physical setback but one that brought forth a remarkable discovery for Rick.

He learned that Odile was not just a caring wife and a loving mother, not just a skilled hostess and devoted patroness, not just a talented linguist and art history scholar, but an angel of mercy.

All the advantages of education and career mean little without love in our lives. When that love finds it greatest expression in our hour of need, we can indeed count ourselves among the blessed.

This past June, Rick brought together a wide circle of their family and friends to celebrate all that Odile has meant to him in their years together. The gathering at Versailles Palace was an extraordinary expression of Rick's love.

But the gilt and glitter of that magnificent setting paled in comparison to what shined forth in from the hearts of all there assembled in tribute to Odile.

In the many decades I have known Rick, he has enjoyed tremendous success in academics, athletics, and business. However, the triumph that counts the most is the crown of his heart, his incomparable wife Odile, my good friend's own angel of mercy.●

NATIONAL SCHOOL BACKPACK AWARENESS DAY

● Mr. FRIST. Mr. President, fall has come and across the country, students are returning to school facing a public health risk from what many see as a completely benign and essential back-to-school supply, the school backpack.

More than 40 million American students carry backpacks to and from school each day. Health experts say that many of our children are hauling around too much weight, and that extra weight can adversely affect their healthy growth and development. Children carrying backpacks that are overloaded or improperly worn are putting themselves at risk for musculoskeletal pain, including back, neck, and shoulder pain, adverse affects on posture and the developing spine and compromised breathing and fatigue.

The good news for parents and kids is that many of these problems can be avoided by taking some very simple steps to help lighten the load. And the first step is education, raising awareness among parents, educators and kids about these potential risks and offering solutions to address them.

To that end, the American Occupational Therapy Association, AOTA, is sponsoring the first of its kind National School Backpack Awareness Day this week, on Wednesday, September 25. On that day, health professionals will hold events in schools across the country to weigh-in backpack-wearing kids and demonstrate the risks of injury that can result from carrying packs that are worn improperly, or are too heavy. Experts say that students should carry backpacks that weigh no more than 15 percent of their total body weight. Occupational Therapists, thousands of whom work every day in America's schools, will offer simple steps in how to properly pack, select and wear school backpacks.

In Nashville, TN, Occupational Therapists will be at the Nashville State Technical Community College helping students learn more about the issue. In Knoxville, there will be a backpack weigh-in and Awareness Day event at Pond Gap Elementary School. I am proud to see these communities taking a leadership role on this important public health issue and I encourage other communities to take similar action on this day to help prevent health care problems that can arise.

Surely, we can all appreciate the bottom line lesson in this important public health education campaign, an ounce of prevention is worth of a pound of cure.●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 2990. A bill to provide for programs and activities to improve the health of Hispanic individuals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill that will be jointly introduced by Representative CIRO RODRIGUEZ tomorrow when the House of Representatives comes into session entitled the "Hispanic Health Improvement Act of 2002." This bill builds upon legislation that Representative RODRIGUEZ introduced in the last Congress and addresses the tremendous health disparities that confront the Hispanic community in our Nation.

Even if you know the statistics, they remain shocking. Over one-third, or 35 percent of Hispanic adults lack health insurance. Despite the passage of the Children's Health Insurance Program, 27 percent of Latino children remain uninsured, which is sharp comparison to 9 percent of white, 18 percent of black and 17 percent of Asian/Pacific Islander children.

In testimony before the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee earlier today on Hispanic health issues, Dr. Glenn Flores, chair of the Latino Consortium of the American Academy of Pediatrics Center for Child Health Research, added:

> Among uninsured poor children in the U.S., Latinos outnumber all other racial/ethnic groups, including whites: there are 1 million poor, uninsured Latino children, compared with 766,000 white, and 533,000 African-American poor, uninsured children. . . . Although 1999 marked the first time in many years that the proportion of uninsured Latino children actually decreased (from 30% to 27%), recent national data suggest that outreach efforts to enroll Latino children have largely been unsuccessful. A Kaiser Commission report found that only 26% of parents of eligible uninsured children said that they had ever talked to someone or received information about Medicaid enrollment, and 46% of Spanish-speaking parents were unsuccessful at enrolling their uninsured children in Medicaid because materials were unavailable in Spanish.

In order to address the lack of health care coverage, the legislation would expand CHIP to cover pregnant women and parents of children enrolled in CHIP. The legislation provides $50 million in grants to community-based groups to improve outreach and enrollment of children in Medicaid and CHIP with the grants targeted to Hispanic communities.

In addition, the bill eliminates a number of enrollment barriers within Medicaid.

And finally, it provides States the option to enroll legal immigrant pregnant women and children in Medicaid or CHIP. This comes from legislation introduced by Senator GRAHAM earlier in this Congress.

In addition to poor coverage rates, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, or CDC, the Hispanic population has morbidity and mortality rates that more often than not exceed that of any other ethnic groups. For example, age-adjusted mortality rates for diabetes are over 50 percent higher among Hispanic persons than non-Hispanic whites. HIV infection rates are over 3 times those of non-Hispanic whites. Tuberculosis rates among Latino children are 13 times that of whites.

The legislation addresses these problems in a number of ways. In the area of access and affordability, our bill requires an annual report to Congress on how Federal programs are responding to improve the health status of Hispanic individuals with respect to diabetes, cancer, asthma, HIV infection, AIDS, substance abuse, and mental health. The bill provides $100 million for targeted diabetes prevention, education, school-based programs, and screening activities in the Hispanic community.

In addition, the legislation specifically addresses the problems facing communities along the U.S.-Mexico border, a 2,000-mile stretch of land that contains 11 million people, 5 of the 7 poorest metropolitan statistical areas in the country, and disease rates in some areas that are extraordinary. If the region were a State, the border would rank first in the number of uninsured, last in terms of per capita income, and first in a number of diseases.

As Dr. Francisco Cigarroa, president of the University of Texas Health Sciences Center at San Antonio, noted in testimony at today's earlier hearing on Hispanic health, "Germs respect no INS regulations. We truly must work with our neighbors to the South if we are to avoid a major influx of new conditions and diseases. It can be seen so clearly on a map. Just as there are 'rivers of commerce' there are 'rivers of infectious disease' and though they may start at the Border, they are eventually seen all the way to the northern Border that we share with Canada."

In response, the bill provides $200 million to border communities to improve health services and infrastructure along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The numbers I have cited thus far indicate what we do know. Almost as much of a concern is what we do not know with respect to the status of Hispanic health in this Nation. According to one study, only 22 percent of all articles published in major medical journals included non-English-speaking patients.

The bill provides funding to do additional research and work on reducing health disparities in this Nation. Among the various provisions include efforts to improve the recruitment and retention of Hispanic health professionals and programs that support the training health professionals who can provide culturally competent and linguistically appropriate care. With respect to training more minority health professionals, Dr. Cigarroa said at today's hearing, "We should do this because it is the smart thing to do. If we fail to take steps to address the gap between the health of the majority population and the health of the nation's rapidly growing minority populations, we are on a course leading to a collision. We are far too great a nation to allow this to happen."

Representative CIRO RODRIGUEZ, the forthcoming chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, and I have worked together on this legislation to respond to the challenge before us with regard to coverage, access, and health disparities entitled the "Hispanic Health Improvement Act of 2002."

While the legislation puts forth a number of initiatives to address what are disproportionately Hispanic problems, it must be noted that each section of the bill, including those to reduce the number of uninsured and to improve access to care, would improve the overall health of our entire Nation regardless of race or ethnicity.

Over the coming months, I look forward to working with my colleagues to revise and improve upon this legislation for reintroduction in the 108th Congress.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENTS ON SUBMITTED RESOLUTIONS

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 145—RECOGNIZING AND COMMENDING MARY BAKER EDDY'S ACHIEVEMENTS AND THE MARY BAKER EDDY LIBRARY FOR THE BETTERMENT OF HUMANITY

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mrs. Clinton, and Mrs. Hutchison) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. Con. Res. 145

Whereas the Mary Baker Eddy Library for the Betterment of Humanity will officially open on September 29, 2002, in Boston, Massachusetts, thereby making available to the public the Mary Baker Eddy Collections, one of the largest collections of primary source material by and about an American woman;

Whereas the namesake of the Library, Mary Baker Eddy, achieved international prominence during her lifetime (1821–1910) as the founder of Christian Science and was the first woman in the United States to found and lead a religion that became an international movement with members in 139 countries;

Whereas historians compare Mary Baker Eddy to 19th century women reformers like Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony, who took leadership roles at a time when women infrequently did so;

Whereas Mary Baker Eddy founded and served as the pastor of her own church, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, and established a publishing organization that produces numerous publications, including "The Christian Science Monitor", an international daily newspaper that has won 7 Pulitzer Prizes;

Whereas in recognition of the numerous achievements of Mary Baker Eddy, the Women's National Hall of Fame inducted her into its membership in 1995 for having made "an indelible mark on society, religion, and journalism";

Whereas the Mary Baker Eddy Library, a facility of 81,000 square feet, provides a place for people to come together to explore ideas and offers on-site and online educational experiences, programs, and exhibits;

Whereas the Mary Baker Eddy Collections consist of more than 100,000 documents, artifacts, photographs, and other media that chronicle the development of Mary Baker Eddy's ideas and offer an unequalled resource to scholars in women's history and mind-body medicine;

Whereas the Library's initiative to make the previously unpublished materials in the Mary Baker Eddy Collections available to the public is exemplary of, and in full accord with, the intent of the provisions of title 17, United States Code, relating to the publication of previously unpublished materials; and

Whereas the Mary Baker Eddy Library will establish an Institute for the Rediscovery and Preservation of the History of Women in Seneca Falls, New York, the birthplace of the first Women's Rights Convention, in order to showcase new research on the forgotten histories of women and offer educational programs for students: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Congress recognizes and commends—

(1) Mary Baker Eddy for her outstanding achievements and contributions, particularly her contributions to the advancement of women's rights as a public figure and role model in the early stages of the women's rights movement; and

(2) the Mary Baker Eddy Library for the Betterment of Humanity, which will open to the public on September 29, 2002.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is a privilege to submit, on behalf of myself, Senator Clinton and Senator Hutchison, a concurrent resolution to recognize the achievements of Mary Baker Eddy and the opening of the Mary Baker Eddy Library for the Betterment of Humanity. The Library, which officially opens to the public on September 29, will provide public access to the Mary Baker Eddy papers, one of the largest collections of primary source material by and about an American woman.

The Library will provide invaluable insight to Mary Baker Eddy's remarkable life and serve as an important resource for scholars, researchers and the public. Its mission will sustain her powerful legacy that ideas can inspire individuals, empower them and transform their lives.

The Mary Baker Eddy Library, a facility encompassing over 80,000 square feet, will be a dynamic meeting place for people to explore ideas through its on-sight and on-line educational experiences, programs and exhibits. So, too, its unique Mapparium will once again be available to visitors to the Library. The collections consist of over 100,000 documents, artifacts, photographs and other media that chronicle the development of Mary baker Eddy's ideas and offer an unparalleled resource for scholars in women's history, spirituality and journalism.

The Library's effort to release previously unpublished materials in the Mary Baker Eddy Collections to the public will enrich our understanding of her extraordinary achievements. In conjunction with this facility in Boston, the Library will also establish an Institute for the Rediscovery and Preservation of the History of Women in Seneca Falls, New York, the birthplace of the first Women's Rights Convention, in order to showcase research on the forgotten histories of women and offer a wide range of educational programs for students.

I am pleased to submit this resolution to recognize this outstanding woman and the richness of her accomplishments. I would also like to congratulate Virginia Harris for her efforts to ensure that the Mary Baker Eddy Library became a reality and for her tireless energy and visionary leadership as Chairman of the Board of the Christian Science Church.

SPECIAL COMMISSIONS

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, let me begin tonight with a quote from Federalist Paper No. 37, January 11, 1789, by James Madison.

> It is misfortune, inseparable from human affairs, that public measures are rarely investigated with that spirit of moderation which is essential to a just estimate of their real tendency to advance or obstruct the public good.

James Madison believed then it would always be very hard to investigate events and do it in such a way, in moderation and without partisanship, that the public would be able to find out what really happened and then determine what should be done in the future to keep it from happening again—to advance the good or obstruct the bad.

Another quote from an anonymous source goes something along the lines of: If God had created a commission to establish Heaven and Earth, we wouldn't be here today.

Mr. President, my own experiences with commissions over 30 years in Congress have not been good. I view Congressional commissions as an abdication of responsibility. What are we for? Why do we have an Armed Services Committee, an Intelligence Committee, a Governmental Affairs Committee, or a Foreign Affairs Committee?

It seems to me that we in Congress should do the work of reviewing the laws and overseeing the agencies and the various departments. Are they serving the public the right way? In a responsible way? Or is there an abdication of responsibility and duty by the various administrations in charge of running our government?

One of the reasons I have never supported BRAC, the various base closure commissions, is that when we create those commissions we are basically saying: We do not have the courage to do it; do not let us know what is going on; shove it off on a commission and let them do it.

But in the past closing excess bases had always been handled without a commission after every previous war. However, about 20 or 25 years ago Congress started to say: No, we cannot do that, we will not do it.

In the past after previous wars how was the military scaled down? Pentagon officials and other administration officials—after World War I, after World War II, after the Korean war—would send recommendations to the Congress regarding excess capacity and bases they felt were no longer needed. And unless Congress blocked it, the bases were closed. I bet every State in the Nation still has bases left over from World War II. In my own State, we had bases in Hattiesburg, in Greenville, MS, and Greenwood, MS. Some of the finest airport runways in our State are the very sturdy concrete runways that were built during World War II for air training facilities.

Congress simply acted and then the administration acted. Then powerful members of Congress started saying: No, you cannot close my base; close someone else's base. That is what ultimately led to the creation of commissions.

I have no doubt about the integrity and the good intentions of Senator LIEBERMAN and Senator MCCAIN with their proposal to create an independent commission to investigate September 11, 2001. How did that attack happen, where were the failures, and how can we avoid repeating them. I know these two men. They are men of good faith that feel so strongly about our country they want this to be a positive thing. They envision some commission of grand pooh-bahs and gray eminences that will assemble and give us the benefit of their great wisdom, men and women who have been in the Government, been in the intelligence community, been in Congress, and thus could do the country a great service.

Mr. President, the track record of that happening is unfortunately very poor. As with all commissions, there are fundamental problems with this commission. Of course, we are now in the second iteration of how this commission would be set up and I presume there will be a third and a fourth. I presume the House will have yet a different version after they go through their iterations of a commission. And then the Administration has concerns that will have to be addressed as well.

Let me point out where a few of the problems with this particular commission are. Initially, the first draft of the Lieberman-McCain proposal would have had 14 Members, 5 appointed by the Democrat leaders in Congress, 5 by the Republican leaders in Congress and 4 by the President with the President naming the chairman.

Then someone figured out, wait a minute; that means there would be nine Republicans and five Democrats. That doesn't look bipartisan enough. So they said we cannot do that.

Now what is actually in the legislation as proposed is that five people would be appointed by the Democratic leadership and five by Republicans. Senator DASCHLE appoints three; I would appoint two; the Speaker would appoint three; and Congressman GEPHARDT, two—for a total of 10 members. However, there are no Presidentially appointed members, and no process for selecting a chairman. The bill just says there will be a chairman and a vice chairman of opposite parties. So, wonderful, how are the Chairman and Vice Chairmen going to be chosen. By Heaven?

If the commission were constituted that way they would be meeting 3 months just to pick their chairman. Which Member is going to break ranks and vote with the other five? I know the presumption is that these will be men and women of such eminence and prominence that they would meet, all 10 of them, and quickly decide on a chairman and a vice chairman and they would move along swiftly.

It "ain't" going to happen. I have had direct personal experience with a few commissions over the past 10 years, particularly when I was majority leader. I was involved in setting up a gaming commission to look at gaming in America, the effects of gaming, Internet and Indian gaming and the problems associated with gambling. I don't know how much money they spent for that commission. And good men and women were on that commission—men, women, minorities, and Native Americans representing all the various viewpoints. It was well constituted and the people who appointed the members did an exceptionally good job.

The commission members met, they acted seriously, they went all over the country, they thought about it, and they filed a report, and closed up their commission. I bet not one U.S. Senator ever read the report, ever. And I am embarrassed to say I read an outline and kind of glanced over it. I was not an advocate of the gaming commission, but I went along with it at the request of, among others, my great friend from Indiana, Dan Coats. Good work. Good intentions, Mr. President. Nothing came of it.

Even more recently, we had the Breaux Commission on Medicare. That was an interesting one, too. I think it was set up correctly number-wise, with good people: JAY ROCKEFELLER from the Finance Committee; Bob Kerrey, a very innovative thinker on Medicare; Dr. BILL FRIST was appointed on our side; Senator PHIL GRAMM, certainly one of the most knowledgeable Senators in this area who is also on the Finance Committee. Even former Finance Committee Chairman Pat Moynihan was on it.

We also had people from the real world on the commission. I know a woman on the commission who was over 70 with silver hair—I will not mention her name because I cannot connect it to her age. She dealt with Medicare on a daily basis. She benefitted from Medicare. She knew what she was talking about. We had all these people who knew what Medicare was supposed to do for the nation's seniors, in theory. It was a great commission.

JOHN BREAUX was the chairman. I might note that it was interesting how JOHN got to be chairman. I remember specifically talking to President Clinton about somebody both sides could accept. We settled on JOHN and he took it and did a good job. The commission met and their meetings were on C-SPAN. They did a lot of thoughtful work, they had good debate, and they made excellent recommendations. They issued a commission report detailing their great recommendations.

What happened to their report Mr. President? Nothing. None of their recommendations have been implemented or acted on. And, by the way, they called for providing a prescription drug benefit. They had a plan to do it without bankrupting the entire Medicare system. It was the Breaux proposal and then the Breaux-Frist proposal. It was a tremendous effort. But nothing ever came of it.

So the track record on Commissions is not good. I don't want this to be a commission that is not set up right, that spends millions of dollars for nothing. I am told it is just $3 million, but I bet it winds up being closer to $12 million or more and that does not count the cost of the assistance that the other parts of the federal government are required to give it under the proposed bill. The commission will also stretch out over 18 months. When its report is ultimately filed, it will garner headlines and discussion on the weekend talk shows for a week or two, but then it will be forgotten and not much will come of it.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that if we do create the commission that I am wrong. But I don't think the prospects or the track record look very good.

Now, again, as I have said, the actual language of the amendment concerns me in many respects. For instance, it says that one of the purposes of the commission would be:

> . . . to ascertain, evaluate, and report on the evidence developed by all relevant governmental agencies regarding the facts and circumstances surrounding the attacks.

However, there is no provision in this bill as to how the commission will have to deal with the evidence they are given by the Department of Justice, U.S. Attorneys, Federal courts, and others in order to safeguard it. Would the public, and our enemies, be able to get this information through the Freedom of Information Act or not? I suppose this issue can be addressed, but it is not clear in the bill as written and it needs to be.

Mr. President, the commission is also given almost total access to the nation's classified information, yet again there is nothing in the proposal that requires or directs the commission to safeguard it. The Senate and House Intelligence Committees have strict rules and elaborate procedures—as does the CIA, DOD, the National Security Agency and other entities entrusted with the nation's top secret information for protecting such information. Yet, there is there is no explicit requirement in this bill for this commission to protect our national secrets.

But again, that is why I like the joint House-Senate Intelligence Committee's efforts—it is equally divided among the parties, they have experience dealing with classified information, and they have settled procedures for handling such information.

Astoundingly, it appears that most of this new commission's proceedings would have to be public since they would be subject to the Federal Advisory Committee Act and that it materials available to the public under the Freedom of Information Act despite that fact that the Commission would be dealing with some of our most important and best kept secrets.

I also have concerns about the procedures for using and the extent of the subpoena authority granted the commission under this amendment. It appears that once elected, the Chairman, Vice Chairman, or even the Chairman of a Subcommittee created by the Commission, can issue any and all subpoenas he or she desires without having to go back to the rest of the Commission for permission, approval, or even a vote on the wisdom or propriety of their subpoena. We do not generally grant such unilateral subpoena authority to Chairman and Ranking members in Congress.

Mr. President, I have been opposed to this commission thus far. First, of course, as I have said, because I oppose commissions almost universally because I do not think they produce good results and because that is what we in Congress are for. But second—and one of the things I have been thinking about—is because we have already had the joint intelligence committee, House and Senate, looking into this matter. Those members have been working through these issues. They are still working on it. They have not yet completed their work. We have not received a final report. We are getting a few preliminary staff reports. Nevertheless, it seems we are going to go ahead and have this vote before we even get to see what the final results of Congress' own inquiry are.

By the way, I do wish the Joint Committee would do their work and tell Congress what we need to do to protect Americans from terrorism in the future. If we need to change even more about how our intelligence community operates, let's do it. I think we can do it in a bipartisan way.

Mr. President, I note that the amendment as proposed also states that the commission will:

> . . . make a full and complete accounting of the circumstances surrounding the attacks, and the extent of the United States' preparedness for, and response to, the attacks . . . [and] investigate and report to the President and Congress on its findings, conclusions, and recommendations for corrective measures that can be taken to prevent acts of terrorism.

I wonder if the sponsors are aware that, since 1995, the Government has produced reams of materials regarding counter-terrorism, intelligence activities, and aviation security. Since 1995, seven commissions have dealt in this area and issued 10 separate reports prior to 9/11.

One of the past commissions was the so-called Gilmore Commission. Its official name was the "U.S. Advisory Panel to Assess Domestic Response Capabilities for Terrorism Involving Weapons of Mass Destruction." The Gilmore Commission submitted three reports to the President and Congress. The first one submitted in 1999 was titled "Assessing the Threat." The second submitted in 2000 was titled, "Toward a National Strategy for Combating Terrorism." The final report submitted just before the 9/11 attacks was titled "For Ray Downey."

The panel consisted of government officials and infrastructure specialists who examined domestic and international threats to the homeland, and made many recommendations for increased security and better coordination between federal and state agencies in combating terrorism.

Then there was the Hart-Rudman Commission led by two very respected

Senators. Its official title was the "U.S. Commission on National Security in the 21st Century" and it ultimately issued reports and specific recommendations in 1999, 2000, 2001.

The reports were titled "New World Coming: Major Themes and Implications" (1999); "Seeking a National Strategy" (2000); and "Road Map for National Security: Imperative for Change" (2001). The commission, which was chartered by then Secretary of Defense William Cohen, had a broad mandate to study "the anticipated security environment in the early 21st Century." Its recommendations in three reports call for a counter-terrorism policy focus on deterrence and domestic preparedness capabilities. Most significantly, the Commission recommended establishing a Homeland Security Agency while noting the need for more human intelligence.

Then there was the "IC21: The Intelligence Community In The 21st Century" Report. This was done by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence which published the report in 1996. The goal was to "define the type of intelligence community which would best meet the U.S. national security needs into the next century."

There was the so-called Bremer Commission created by Public Law 105-277 and officially titled the "U.S. National Commission on Terrorism and National Security in the 21st Century." The Bremer Commission released its report in 2000 and recommended a more aggressive domestic and foreign policy in combating terrorism.

Then there was the Aspin-Brown Commission, led by two more well respected gray eminences of the kind we are talking about—former Congressman Aspin and former Secretary of Defense Harold Brown. The Commission was created by Public Law 103-539 and charged with "Preparing for the 21st Century and Appraisal of U.S. Intelligence."

They made three findings in 1996: That the United States needed to better integrate intelligence into the policy community, needed for intelligence agencies to operate as a community, and needed to create greater efficiency and bring more rigor and modern management practices to the system. This was in 1996.

A really important commission was the "U.S. White House Commission On Aviation Safety and Security," which issued a report from its Chairman—Vice President Gore to President Clinton in 1997. It was a good report. It also had specific recommendations about how to improve aviation security. What happened to it? Nothing was acted on. Congress didn't act on it. Good work was done. This commission was tasked with developing "a strategy to improve aviation safety and security, both domestically and internationally."

Let's look at a few of the recommendations this report made in 1997—over four years before the 9/11 attacks took place. The very first paragraph in the report's 3rd Chapter—titled "Improving Security for Travelers"—said the following:

> The Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, and other intelligence sources have been warning that the threat of terrorism is changing in two important ways. First, it is no longer just an overseas threat from foreign terrorists. People and places in the United States have joined the list of targets, and Americans have joined the ranks of terrorists. The bombings of the World Trade Center in New York and the Federal Building in Oklahoma City are clear examples of the shift, as is the conviction of Ramzi Yousef for attempting to bomb twelve American airliners out of the sky over the Pacific Ocean. The second change is that in addition to well-known, established terrorist groups, it is becoming more common to find terrorists working alone or in ad-hoc groups, some of whom are not afraid to die in carrying out their designs.

Mr. President, that one chapter went on to make 31 recommendations for improving aviation security. Some of those recommendations given over four years before 9/11 tragedy were as follows:

> Recommendation 3.7—The FAA should work with airlines and airport consortia to ensure that all passengers are positively identified and subjected to security procedures before they board aircraft.
>
> Recommendation 3.9—Assess the possible use of chemical and biological weapons as tools of terrorism.
>
> Recommendation 3.10—The FAA should work with industry to develop a national program to increase the professionalism of the aviation security workforce, including screening personnel.
>
> Recommendation 3.11—Access to airport controlled areas must be secured and the physical security of aircraft must be ensured.
>
> Recommendation 3.14—Require criminal background checks and FBI fingerprints for all screeners, and all airport and airline employees with access to secure areas.
>
> Recommendation 3.17—Establish an interagency task force to assess the potential use of surface-to-air missiles against commercial aircraft.
>
> Recommendation 3.19—Complement technology with automated passenger profiling.
>
> Recommendation 3.20—Certify screening companies and improve screener performance.
>
> Recommendation 3.21—Aggressively test existing security systems.
>
> Recommendation 3.23—Give properly cleared airline and airport security personnel access to the classified information they need to know.
>
> Recommendation 3.24—Begin implementation of full bag-passenger match.
>
> Recommendation 3.26—Improve passenger manifests.
>
> Recommendation 3.27—Significantly increase the number of FBI agents assigned to counter-terrorism investigations, to improve intelligence and to crisis response.

Mr. President, all of this information is in the public record. It is there. Why don't we make use of it?

The list goes on. There were over 90 GAO reports before 9/11 and now there are over 50 GAO reports on Aviation and National Security and Terrorism since 9/11. There was a 1999 report titled "The FBI 30-year Retrospective Special Report on Counter-terrorism" that was put out by the FBI's Counter-Terrorism Division and which detailed 30 years of terrorism. It was done after terrorists were caught in 1999 trying to smuggle bomb-making materials into Jordan, and into the US from Canada in Washington State to disrupt celebrations of the Millennium.

That report gave the American public the following assurances in 1999:

> In November 1999, the FBI restructured its National Security Division to create, for the first time, a division-level component dedicated specifically to combating terrorism.
>
> In 1999 the FBI established the Counterterrorism and the Investigative Services divisions to further enhance the operational and analytic focus on the full range of activities in which violent extremists engage.

The FBI's 30-year retrospective report concluded with the following—as it turned out false—assurance in 1999:

> While the threat is formidable, the U.S. intelligence and law enforcement community have developed an effective and highly integrated response to the [counter-terrorism threat.] . . . Increasingly, the FBI's efforts involve the assistance and cooperation of other intelligence and law enforcement agencies. The threats of the new Millennium require such an integrated and aggressive response.

Mr. President, do you see my point? Good work has been done by good men and women, experts in this field, reports on what we need to do in order to do a better job—in 1996, 1997, 1998 and 1999 and 2000 and 2001. All this good work by the commissions, the GAO, the FBI, and others has not resulted in us doing anything about it.

Now we are going to have one more commission report. These are the commission reports on my desk that have been done already since 1995—a pretty good stack. It is very interesting reading.

The GAO report here, just on the top, "Combating Terrorism, FBI'S Use of Federal Funds for Counter-terrorism and Related Activities"—there is just simply a plethora of counter-terrorism reports available making thousands of recommendations. These reports did not look at the specific events that led up to 9/11 and what happened and what we have learned from that, but they did look at what we should have been doing to prevent it.

I think, unfortunately, this commission amendment is probably going to be agreed to, but I wanted to raise my concerns about the way the commission amendment is drafted, the way the commission would be created, the cost that would be involved, and the likelihood that at the end of the day its findings will meet the fate of those from so many commissions before it.

As to money, I am sure they are starting off way low. They will be back asking for an increase in money within 3 to 6 months. I have already experienced that, too. In fact, one of the commissions I referred to earlier came back wanting more money, they wanted a little bit more, they came back yet a second time but I said: No. Wrap it up.

So I just do not think this is a wise thing to do. I think we ought to do it, or I think the administration ought to do it, but somebody needs to grab hold of this and do it the right way. Maybe the joint intelligence committee can still give us what we need in order to decide if we need more laws or if we need more reform within the intelligence community. But this commission is not going to bring us a lot more. It may get a few big headlines. It is going to cost a lot more money. Yet, I doubt if much will come out of it.

By the way, probably the earliest we will get anything out of it specifically would be 18 months from now. Goodness gracious, if we need to take action on what we have learned and what we know, are we going to wait for 18 months to see this commission report before we act? By the time this commission acts, I fervently hope that Congress will already have done everything that needs to be done as a result of the events of 9/11.

I thank the Chair for showing patience, and the staff here. I do not want to keep them too long. But I was afraid I would not get an opportunity to raise these questions tomorrow before we go to the vote. Maybe there will be a stampede to just get this done, but, boy, we are going to need to do a lot of work before we enact it into law.

I believe we are ready to complete our work for the day. I yield the floor.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 9:25 A.M. TOMORROW

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. CANTWELL). Under the previous order, the Senate stands adjourned until 9:25 tomorrow morning.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 7:07 p.m., adjourned until Tuesday, September 24, 2002, at 9:25 a.m.

Ms. LEE. Mr. Speaker, I am tremendously proud to rise today to recognize two of my constituents, Judi Rogers and Young Shin, for recently winning the Nation's highest honor for community health leadership from The Robert Wood Johnson Foundation.

Rogers and Shin captured two of the ten national awards for their work in the Oakland and Berkeley communities. They were selected from a pool of over 450 nominees from across the country, and will each receive a grant for $120,000 to continue their important work.

Rogers has been recognized for her work with Through the Looking Glass—a Berkeley organization serving families with disabilities—where she provides childbirth and parenting education for mothers with disabilities. She provides home-based services to more than 35 families a year, most of them low income. She also leads a monthly support group.

Her work touches families well beyond Berkeley. As part of Through the Looking Glass' National Resource Center for Parents with Disabilities, she offers technical assistance and training for parents and professionals both nationally and internationally. The Center is funded by the Department of Education's National Institute of Disability and Rehabilitation Research. She is also the author of "Mother to Be: A Guide to Pregnancy and Birth for Women with Disabilities."

Rogers' has drawn on her own experience as an occupational therapist and disabled mother of two to inspire her work. A recent battle with breast cancer also convinced her to initiate a community outreach program to provide breast cancer screening services to women with disabilities.

As Roger's nominator for the award aptly put it, "She has opened up a whole new world for people with disabilities."

Young Shin launched the Asian Immigrant Women Advocates (AIWA) in 1983 to empower Asian immigrant women in California's factories to create healthier working conditions. Since 1991, her work has focused on addressing health and safety issues, especially for garment and electronics workers at risk for chronic injuries and exposure to hazardous chemicals. The group's Peer Health Promoter Project has trained over 75 women as peer educators, who have, in turn, trained an additional 300 women on workplace injury prevention.

In 2000, Shin partnered with the University of California-San Francisco to establish the two-year Asian Immigrant Women Workers Clinic. The clinic, which is located near the garment factories in Oakland's Chinatown district, has treated more than 250 women with ergonomic injuries. The clinic has now expanded its services and operates independently with low-wage Asian and Latino workers under the auspices of UCSF.

Shin also developed a project to set up sewing labs where garment workers can collaborate with health care professionals to design and test practical, low-cost workstation improvements.

On top of all these efforts, her group also sponsors literacy classes, leadership training and campaigns on workplace issues.

Mr. Speaker, it's plain to see that Judi Rogers and Young Shin are tremendously deserving of their recent awards and I am thrilled to call attention to their achievements. I urge my colleagues to join me in congratulating them both.

EULOGY TO DONALD LEO DUCHARME

HON. MARTIN T. MEEHAN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 2002

Mr. MEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I was saddened to learn of the tragic death of Donald Leo Ducharme on June 11, 2002. Donald was a Dracut, Massachusetts resident, Lowell-native, and dedicated teacher for 27 years at the Greater Lawrence Vocational High School. He is survived by his wife of 36 years, Rita and his six children, Heidi, Dawn, Jessica, Donald, Todd, and Toby. A beautiful eulogy was given on June 14, 2002, at St. Magdalen's Church in Dracut by his son, Donald. I ask for unanimous consent to submit it to the RECORD:

First of all, I want to thank everyone for coming. It is really amazing how many people I have seen over the past couple of days. You may think that it was tough to stand up yesterday for 8 hours, but the longer it went the easier it got. It was such an incredible tribute to see for my father. I would also like to ask you to keep a smile on your face and feel free to laugh, Dad would want it that way, and I may need the help.

Some of you maybe wondering how I was picked to be up here. I'm happy to say that it was actually my father's wish. I know this because we talked about it. About a year ago, I had a short strange dream one night. It started with me in this same exact spot. I walked to the podium and the first thing I did was ask the question, "How many of you people think my father is one of the biggest pains in the butt you know?" The wording was a little more harsh, if you know what I mean. Anyway, half the place raised their hands. I followed that question with another, "Now how many people would think of that same pain in the butt as the first person to call if you needed help with something?" and all the same hands plus a few extras came up. I awoke just after, thinking that was a very strange dream. I wasn't sure whether or not to tell him about it, but after working with him for so many years, I was able to talk to him about anything. I told him the story a few days later, which was also just after the family's long time friend and neighbor, Mr. Pepin passed away. He said, "You know, when I was at Mr. Pepin's funeral, I thought about asking you to do it." So here I am.

In the time since September 11th, many people have been called heroes. So, I named this next section "Our Fallen Hero":

He may not be a veteran of a military war, but did I ever have some with my brothers. He wasn't a policeman, but he was at least a traffic cop in our house. He wasn't a fireman, but no one could build a more beautiful, safer place for a fire. He was always there when you needed him, no questions asked, except to find out what tools he needed to bring. He is our Fallen Hero.

Okay, enough mushy stuff, OR we do the mushy stuff his way and all line up for slaps in the back of the head, any takers? Yes, it was a strange way to show love, and it didn't make much sense for a long time. He wanted things done right and done right meant his way. As much as I tried to prove him wrong, somehow he was always right. It started making sense to me when I was about 16. I was thinking about getting my license and therefore needed a car. Well, when I was 12, 13, 14 years old it didn't make much sense to me why I had to go to work with him all summer and every Saturday during school, but when I asked my Mom how much money I had to buy a car it started making sense. Then a couple of years later I started realizing it had nothing to do with the money, but it had everything to do with the ability and skills it takes to be able to make money, and making money really meant being able to stand on your own two feet and providing for your own family some day.

We all had our lessons growing up. Heidi was in charge of cleaning the pool, and no one kept it cleaner than her. The only problem was Dad thought she dragged the hose on the concrete and put holes in it. So, he booted her in the butt all the way to her bedroom and she was grounded. Sometime later, maybe a couple of months or the next summer, there were a few more leaks in conjunction with butt chewings and punishments. It turns out it wasn't Heidi at all. Luckily, for her, Pepere R. Dad's father-in-law, figured out that because of the way the hose was hung on the fence the sun was actually melting holes in it.

Then there was Dawn Ann; could be here all day, only because there is no one more like Dad. Dad was always very strict with his girls, especially with all the guys that were always hanging around the house. One day my parents weren't around when Dawn got a call to go to a Celtics game. She really did want to ask for permission, uh huh, but it was before everyone carried a cell phone. So in her infinite wisdom she decides she is going into Boston on the train with 3 of the guys to a Celtics game. Mom and Dad came home and asked Heidi where Dawn was. You would have thought there was a steam engine train in the living room with the smoke that came out of his ears. You guessed it, Grounded!

Jessica. As any parent knows, you never want to pick favorites out of your kids, or at least admit it. Well, we all know that Jess is the favorite, Daddy's little girl, can do no wrong. Just a couple of weeks ago I was at my parents' unloading my truck from a long day of work. As I was about to leave, Dad came out of the house and said, "Jessica just called and there is a bat in the house. Do you mind giving me a hand?" Now mind you it was about 8:00 in the evening and Dad hadn't even eaten dinner yet, but it was Jessica, so we went over right away, of course after we grabbed the necessary tools: a fishing net, racquetball racquets and leather gloves. We show up and Jess and her roommate are hiding in her car. Dad is there to save the day so they got out of the car and proceeded to tell us the bat was this big, it had fangs and was hissing at them. Frankie had also shown up in the mean time. The three guys go into the house looking all over. We went upstairs to double check rooms we already searched and as Dad opened a door, he saw it flying and slammed the door shut. The hunt was on, we had it trapped in one room, but we had to make our plan. Frankie suggested going out onto the roof of the farmer's porch from the other bedroom and try to see where the bat was. I crawled out onto the roof and made my way over to the bedroom window. The shades were almost all the way shut, except for a small slot in the middle. Dad has his hand on the door ready to barge through with the racquet when I give him the okay. I see the TINY bat flying around. I'm yelling, "Not yet, not yet!" from the roof, and then I'm not sure where it is, so I said, "I think it landed in the closet." Dad makes his charge, but I was wrong, it wasn't in the closet, it was flying right at him. In a flash, I see his eyes light up, a scream come out of his mouth, and the racquet whipping around. I almost rolled off the roof I was laughing so hard as I witnessed this all through the window. Once again, our Hero came through. A little side note to Frankie, No pressure, but if you had plans to ask Dad for Jessica's hand in marriage you're in trouble, because now you have to come through me!

This next one is about Toby, another one I could go on all day about. One day, all 6 kids went to McDonald's with Mom. Right before we left the restaurant Toby snatched up some ketchup packets and put them in his pocket. When we arrived home, Toby decided that it would be funny to put the ketchup under the tires of Mom's car. Next thing you know, Mom drove off and the ketchup splattered all over the driveway.

We all thought this was hysterical, until later that evening when Dad YELLED downstairs, "Kids, get up here! All of you!"

We all thought we were going to get into trouble for the ketchup incident and didn't think twice about pushing Toby up the stairs first (since he did it of course). As we all crept up the stairs, cowering behind Toby, we inched down the seemingly never-ending hallway to Mom and Dad standing in the kitchen. With the look of death on their faces, we became more nervous. They sat us down and began speaking in a stern voice. But instead of getting in trouble, they proceeded to tell us that we would be visiting Disney World for Christmas.

I bet they never saw such relieved faces as we all laughed and jumped around. We then all started to laugh about thinking we were going to be in such trouble over the ketchup and ended up telling Mom and Dad what had happened earlier that day. To our relief, they laughed too and Toby wasn't in trouble. It turns out Disney wasn't the only thing on the agenda. Dad also built a fireplace for his sister Jackie while we were down there on vacation.

Todd. When it came to just about everything my Dad did, safety was always one of the most important things. One day at work, we were coming to the top of a big chimney. We had staging set up on the roof, and a hoist ladder to bring the material up to the roof. Todd was always the best tree climber in the family, so he was elected to walk the material from the ladder to the staging and up the incline of the roof. Like I said, Dad was always safety conscious, so he tied a rope around Todd and then tied it to the staging, in case he slipped. Todd backed up a step and had a very nervous look on his face. My father was concerned and said, "Todd, are you still afraid to fall," and he replied, "No". So he asked why he looked so scared, and Todd replied, "I don't like being tied so close to you that I don't have a chance to get away before you slap me if I do something wrong." It was always tough love from Dad.

Some of those stories make him sound like a bad guy, but really, he only meant the best for his kids. Officially, he only had 6 kids, but sometimes it seemed more like 26. He treated so many of our friends and relatives as if they were his own. For example, even with 6 kids on his hands, he didn't hesitate for a second to bring his nephew Jeremy into our house when his brother fell off a roof and was paralyzed. Jeremy became another brother to all of us. There are many others he treated with the same love, to name a few, TJ, Rick and Reg, Frankie and Shawn, Lisa, Nicky, Lyle, Bobby, Patrick, all of the guys that ever worked for him, Mike, the Kenny's, Scooter, Billy, and many others, you know who you are.

Not only was he a great father to many, but he was also a true friend and brother. Over the past couple of days, it felt kind of strange hearing some of these people say sorry to me for my loss, and the rest of my brothers and sisters. It felt strange because I thought I should be saying the same to them knowing what they lost, the best friend or brother you could ever ask for. Aunt Ruby, Aunt Jackie, Uncle Gerry, Uncle Norm, Ralph, Peter, Billy, Rudy, Klaus, Ronny and so many others, I just can't name them all.

As a Pepere, to his 7 ⅔ grandchildren, Victoria, Ali, Gary B, Mitch, AJ, Kelly, Josh, and one soon to be. What a treat to go to Pepere's house, the surprise bag (a toy or treat for each kid, every time they came to the house), rides on the Bobcat, playing in the sand pile, ice cream sundaes right after breakfast, the ball pit, swings on the tree, and even a swing in the house just in case it rained. If your Mom or Dad said No, just ask Pepere.

As a husband, Mom, I don't know how you did it. Not only did she take care of 6 kids, but he was the biggest kid of all. He loved to play: fishing, Nascar, racquetball, driving the Vette (at 160 mph early Sunday morning). There were so many things he loved to do and he did them right to the end, but most sacred of all in his heart was you Mom. He couldn't have done any of the things he did without knowing you would be waiting there for him when he got home. Especially seeing the only thing the man could cook was popcorn!

Thank You.

AMERICA'S TECHNOLOGY INDUSTRY

HON. C.L. "BUTCH" OTTER

OF IDAHO

Monday, September 23, 2002

Mr. OTTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to place into the RECORD a newspaper article carrying a welcome story about America's technology industry. Over the last year the financial markets, as well as the American people, have been rocked by stories of huge corporations that used accounting chicanery and outright lies to defraud investors. I am proud to say that Micron, based in Boise, Idaho, has a worldwide reputation for conservative accounting and fair-dealing with employees, investors, and the community. I am hopeful that innovative, upstanding companies like Micron will lead this Nation into economic recovery and renewed faith in the marketplace.

[From the EE Times, Asia, Sept. 16, 2002]

MICRON'S COST MANAGEMENT ENVY

Micron execs have been talking about conservative financial management long before the industry came to know about the shocking revelations of Worldcom's accounting irregularities.

Some EEs in Silicon Valley often wonder how Micron Technology Inc. escapes cyclical storms that have become the hallmark of semiconductor businesses. Industry observers generally point to its single-minded focus on memories and its frugal culture that helps keep production costs low.

But there is something more remarkable about the Boise, Idaho-based company that became evident only lately: conservative accounting. Micron execs have been talking about conservative financial management long before the industry came to know about the shocking revelations of WorldCom's accounting irregularities.

Memory business has been intensely competitive, and on top of that, sometimes countries or rather a group of companies tend to make memories a strategic business. "We prepare for that by not borrowing too much money, which helps us prepare to face all kinds of situations," says a Micron executive.

In 1990, Micron was ranked as the 11th DRAM maker, while last year, it was the second largest memory vendor. Despite the rupture of the Hynix deal and the fear of decline in DRAM market this year, Micron is progressively investing in new technologies.

The memory chipmaker has recently demonstrated the first DDR–II system for PC applications—with memory channel running at 533/MHz data rate for a channel bandwidth of 4,300/MBps. The demonstration included a variety of developments including a 256/Mb DDR–II device, a hardware-analysis board and signal-analysis software.

The system would allow not only to verify DDR–II channel performance, but also to characterize how well the channel works for various operating conditions, data patterns as well as timing and voltage margins.

While Micron's decisions are driven around cost scenarios, this tradition will soon be put to the test in the much talked-about 200/mm-to-300/mm conversion. So far, the chipmaker seems to be a trendsetter as it relates the 300/mm transition to production cost. As CEO Steve Appleton puts it, the company doesn't care what anyone else is doing, unless it helps to drive the cost of 300/mm and change the model.

After the irrational exuberance of 2000 was followed by pessimism last year, the industry is waking up to new realities born out of accounting loopholes. Here, Micron's prescience and financial savvy can provide some significant lessons.

INTRODUCTION OF THE WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 2002

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

Monday, September 23, 2002

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to introduce, along with the Ranking Member of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, JAMES OBERSTAR, the Water Resources and Environment Subcommittee Chairman, JOHN J. DUNCAN, JR., and the Ranking Member of the Water Resources and Environment Subcommittee, PETER DEFAZIO, the Water Resources Development Act of 2002.

Every two years, Congress makes it a high priority to meet our Nation's water resources needs by enacting a Water Resources Development Act. Through this legislation, Congress authorizes the Corps of Engineers to carry out its primary missions of providing navigation improvements at harbors and waterways, flood damage reduction in our communities and coastal areas, and environmental restoration along the Nation's rivers, and lakes. These projects have a profound impact on the economy of this Nation by reducing transportation costs, saving lives, homes, and businesses from the ravages of flooding, and improving our quality of life. The standard of living for every American has been positively affected by the work the Corps does with its local partners.

Under authorities enacted in Water Resources Development Acts, the Corps of Engineers constructs harbors and navigation channels. Over 13 million American jobs are depended on trade, making our ports and waterways vital to our economic, as well as national, security. Our harbors currently handle over 2 billion tons of cargo a year, and that volume is projected to double by 2020. We need to be ready to handle the larger ships that will carry that cargo or face potential loss of trade. Our inland navigation system is critical to our transportation system. Inland waterways cover 12,000 miles and carry ⅙th of the Nation's inter-city freight, at a cost per ton-mile that is ½ that of rail and ⅒th that of trucks. We need to keep transportation of goods on our inland waterways efficient to keep our farmers competitive in the world market.

The Water Resources Development Act of 2002 helps our Nation stay competitive by authorizing or modifying over 50 projects, studies, and policies relating to navigation improvements, as well as related projects and policy changes to improve the management of dredged material.

Water Resources Development Acts also authorize the Corps to protect towns and cities from the ravages of floods. Over the past 10 years, flood damage reduction projects built by the Corps with local partners have prevented more than $208 billion in damages.

Water Resources Development Act of 2002 continues to provide this protection by authorizing or modifying over 75 projects and studies relating to flood damage reduction, and nearly 20 related projects for shoreline protection.

Since 1990, environmental restoration also has been a primary mission of the Corps. These projects range from small aquatic ecosystem restoration projects to multi-billion dollar projects like the Comprehensive Everglades Restoration Plan.

The Water Resources Development Act of 2002 continues this mission by authorizing or modifying over 40 environmental restoration projects and studies.

In this legislation, we also recognize that there are other water resources challenges that face this Nation where the Corps' expertise could help—particularly since needs for water supply, water quality, and navigation often are interrelated. The Water Resource Development Act of 2002 provides additional opportunities for the Corps to lend its technical expertise where a community or a region has decided to address water resources matters on a watershed or river basin basis.

There are some who believe we do not need a Corps of Engineers Civil Works program. Some say it openly, and propose to eliminate funding the Corps. Others are more subtle and instead are trying to convince Congress to add so many procedural hurdles that a single person could have the ability to stop a water resources project, no matter how important the project is to the safety of our citizens or the strength or our economy. I have a different view of the Corps and a different vision for its future.

First, I believe that this Nation needs an Army Corps of Engineers. Most members of the House of Representatives agree. We have received requests from nearly 200 members for over 400 separate water resources projects, studies, and modifications to projects. These requests are generated at the local level, and are tailored to meet local needs. No matter what some may say here in Washington, back home people want and need a vital and continuing civil works program.

Second, I support the Corps process for formulating water resources projects. Under the Corps planning process, all projects must be in the Federal interest and must be economically justified and environmentally sound, but the details of a project are developed through a close interaction between the Corps and the local communities that share in the cost of the project. This is a bottom-up process that allows projects to be designed to best meet local needs.

Deciding where investments in water resources are warranted is a complex task often involving sophisticated economic analyses. While there has been some criticism of how the Corps has attempted to do these analyses in certain projects, the fact is no other Federal agency requires its projects to go through a similar benefit cost review.

There have been some individual cases where the economic analysis of a project has been flawed. This is a personnel and management problem, not a problem with the Corps' statutory authorities. The Chief of Engineers is taking steps to address this issue through improved training and establishing centers of expertise. We in Congress also have many oversight tools that give us the ability to investigate the merits of a project, and we have demonstrated that we are not hesitant to use these tools to scrutinize controversial projects.

After reviewing all of the requests from members, it is clear to us that the House of Representatives supports changes to the Corps civil works program to speed the delivery of projects, not changes that will lengthen the Corps' process and add costs. For example, we have received over 40 requests from members asking that their local project sponsors be allowed to move ahead of the Corps and receive credit for work they begin on projects, while the Corps' lengthy study and review process is underway. Other members of Congress requested statutory language directing the Corps to expedite its planning process and deliver needed projects more quickly. No member of Congress has asked the Committee to add more procedural hurdles, more delay, and more costs to their projects.

The Corps civil works program is nearly unique. The Corps is a Federal agency that partners with local agencies to solve local problems. The needs are identified at the local level and the solutions are developed through a bottom-up process—they are not thrust upon a community as top-down mandates. I am proud to say that the Water Resources Development Act of 2002 continues in this tradition.

THE TERRORIST ATTACKS OF SEPTEMBER 11, 2001

HON. TIMOTHY V. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, September 23, 2002

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday our nation commemorated the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. While these attacks were committed on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, they were in fact directed at our nation as a whole. Our freedom, our way of life, the very foundations of our great democracy, were ruthlessly targeted by an unprecedented force of evil. Now, one year later, our nation is stronger and more unified than ever to rid the world of terrorism in all of its forms, as well as its root causes including poverty, injustice, and despair. It is my sincere hope that America never forgets the terrible atrocities committed within our borders. These acts were a direct attack upon freedom-loving people everywhere and we have a duty to ensure that freedom and democracy prevail in this struggle against tyranny and oppression.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT CONFEREES ON H.R. 3295, HELP AMERICA VOTE ACT OF 2001

SPEECH OF

HON. DANNY K. DAVIS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 18, 2002

Mr. DAVIS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support Congresswoman WATERS' motion asking the conferees for H.R. 3295 to complete their work and file a conference report by October 1st. In view of the confusion we have witnessed this month in Florida's primary elections, it is more important than ever that we complete work on this measure before the end of this session. I also want to re-affirm my support for the motion to instruct offered by Mr. LANGEVIN that was passed by the House on July 9th. That motion asked the conferees to agree to the Senate provisions relating to the accessibility of voting systems for individuals with disabilities.

It is essential that at least one voting machine in each polling place be accessible to people with disabilities. This can be done in a manner that provides the same opportunity for access and participation, including privacy and independence, as for other voters. The provisions referred to in the motion passed on July 9 were endorsed by a coalition of more than 20 national organizations representing people with disabilities.

I support the motion asking the conferees to complete their work by October 1st, and I also urge the conferees to adopt the language as outlined in the motion approved by this body on July 9th.

JOINT RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING THE USE OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES AGAINST IRAQ

HON. ALCEE L. HASTINGS

OF FLORIDA

Monday, September 23, 2002

Mr. HASTINGS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a Joint Resolution. It authorizes the use of U.S. Armed Forces to defend our national security interests against the threat posed by Iraq. However, this Resolution does set some definitive conditions for the President prior to engaging the U.S. Armed Forces. It requires the President to exhaust diplomatic efforts to obtain Iraq's compliance with the U.N. Security Council Resolutions. It also requires the President to present the Congress with a comprehensive plan of how stability will be maintained in the region in a post-strike environment.

The young men and women of our Armed Forces are already fighting a war on terrorism. Before we expand their role, and send them even deeper into harm's way, I want assurances that we have explored and exhausted every avenue for a peaceful and diplomatic solution. I also want assurances that we have a plan for maintaining stability in the region once we declare victory.

Let me be perfectly clear. I am well aware that for more than a decade, Iraq has violated virtually every U.N. Security Council Resolution. With each violation, the threat to international peace and security becomes more ominous. I believe that Iraq not only poses a threat to our national security interests, but also threatens the stability and security of the entire region and indeed, the world. It is becoming more and more evident that we must be proactive in defending our nation. We know that the United States is a terrorism target, and we know that Iraq constitutes a real and imminent threat against our national security interests.

However, only Congress has the authority to declare war. The Congress must be convinced that every conceivable option has been explored. The Congress must be convinced that the post-strike plan for maintaining stability in that region is achievable. The Congress must agree that a preemptive strike is our only course of action.

I urge my colleagues to vote for this Resolution.

CRISIS IN THE CHILD WELFARE SYSTEM

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, September 23, 2002

Mr. GEORGE MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, we can all agree that the quality of care received by children under the supervision and protective custody of the state is an important aspect of the foster care system. Unfortunately, there is widespread disagreement between states and the federal government on how quality of care standards should be defined, assessed, and enforced.

In the following article, the Sacramento Bee reports that California's Department of Social Services and the U.S. Administration for Children and Families are immersed in a heated battle over foster care licensing standards. At issue, is a 2-year-old federal mandate that directs states to equalize foster home licensing standards between relative and non-relative foster care providers.

The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) contends that the long-standing regulation that allowed states to exempt relative caregivers from meeting some of the licensing standards that applied to professional non-relative foster parents created a separate and unequal standard that could not be upheld. HHS maintains that it repeatedly told states like California in writing that it could not bill the federal government for relative foster homes that failed to meet federal regulations. Consequently, the U.S. Administration for Children and Families withheld $18 million in grants from California for failure to bring relative foster homes up to non-relative foster home standards.

In response, California asserts that the federal government's insistence on rigid compliance with non-relative foster care standards eliminates room for flexibility in overlooking minimal licensing violations. Additionally, California argues it threatens their ability to place children in the homes of loving and caring relatives that are unable to fully meet licensing requirements because of issues of poverty. According to the California Deputy Director of Social Services "it [relative foster home;] could be a very loving, giving family, but the question is can the child go there if, for example, the siblings will sleep [together] in a double bed."

The battle unfolding in California may be just the tip of the iceberg. In many states across the nation, kinship care standards vary and are more relaxed than non-relative foster care standards. If we truly believe the safety and well-being of children should come first, then we must begin to carefully assess and examine child welfare issues such as kinship care practice and foster care licensing standards. While it is the government with the power of the purse that may ultimately win the war, we must be careful to ensure that the best interests of foster children are not forgotten in the heat of battle.

[From the Sacramento Bee, Sept. 3, 2002]

LAWSUIT TO TARGET RULES FOR FOSTER CARE BY RELATIVES

(By Mareva Brown)

More than $100 million designated for relatives who care for California's foster children is in danger of being withheld over the next year while California's Department of Social Services and a federal regulatory agency wage a fierce battle over standards.

At issue is a 2-year-old federal requirement that relatives caring for foster children be screened and approved using the same criteria as is used to license non-relative foster homes. Federal officials say California has refused to enforce the new standard, and they have begun withholding the first of $112 million in foster care payments that could be held back if tens of thousands of relatives' homes aren't quickly approved using the new standards.

California officials maintain they have followed the intent of the law, eliminating relatives who have criminal pasts or who can't be trusted to keep children safe. But they say following it to the letter would require them to remove children from nurturing relatives who are capable of providing good care but whose homes do not meet federal foster care guidelines, often because of poverty. Of particular concern, state officials say, are federal mandates specifying no more than two children to a bedroom, no shared beds and no mixing of genders in bedrooms—space requirements many impoverished families can't afford to meet.

"It could be a very loving, giving family, but the question is can the child go there if, for example, the siblings will sleep in a double bed," said DSS Deputy Director Sylvia Pizzini. "It's the intersection with poverty that has the roughest edges here."

As state officials tried to hammer out a compromise late last week, a public interest law firm in San Francisco prepared to file a civil lawsuit that would compel the state to comply with the federal standard. The Youth Law Center's executive director, Carole Schauffer, said that while the state bickers over language, it risks robbing foster families of desperately needed funds.

"Even tough this is not a role we logically should take, we're trying to see if there is any peace here," said Schauffer, a staunch advocate for foster children. "Because without peace, it's very harmful to California kids."

The federal government pays for about 40 percent of the cost to care for the nation's half-million foster children. In California, home to nearly 100,000 foster children, the federal share amounts to nearly $300 million per quarter. About half the state's foster children are placed with relatives.

Last spring, the U.S. Administration for Children and Families began deferring $18.7 million per quarter as a penalty for the state's failure to document that all relatives' homes had been cleared. The deferral, which cannot be appealed, comes after two years of debate between federal and state officials over how to interpret and apply the new statute.

While the state has absorbed the first deferral, officials say they eventually will have to reduce foster payments to the counties. The counties, in turn, will have to choose between removing children from the homes of relatives or reducing payment to those relatives.

And for many relatives living close to the edge, providing foster care without the payment simply would be too expensive.

Albert Cabrera and his wife, caring for their 9-month-old granddaughter in a three-bedroom home off Power Inn Road, offer a typical example. The baby was placed there two months ago by social workers who ensured the couple had no criminal record and that the temperature in their hot water heater was safe, and who left the couple with a letter saying they would be reimbursed $425 per month for the child's care.

The Cabreras are among many foster grandparents who are retired or don't earn enough to easily absorb the costs of raising grandchildren. Last week, as the couple waited for their reimbursement check, Cabrera's wife delayed buying medicine for her high blood pressure so she could buy formula for the baby. Cabrera worries about how he'll pay for the additional gas money they'll need each month to take the baby to visits with her parents and to doctor's appointments.

"In the beginning, we thought we would put away the money they were going to send us for the baby," Cabrera said. "But we need it."

Sacramento County actually is among the few counties in California that have inspected relatives' homes using the new standards. Ninety percent of the 1,490 relatives' homes used for foster care in Sacramento County have been approved. The rest are awaiting upgrades and are expected to be certified soon.

But Sacramento County is the exception. Most counties in January began using the standards to approve new foster placements with relatives but have not inspected the homes of relatives where children placed before January.

Until state officials can provide the federal government with proof that all relatives' homes in California have been certified, the penalties will continue—and will affect all counties alike.

The biggest backlog is in Los Angeles.

In March, prompted by the new statute, Los Angeles County conducted a sample survey of the foster homes of children placed with relatives. The county is home to more than half the state's foster children, and nearly 6,500 of them live with relatives.

Of the 200 homes surveyed, only two met federal standards. Among the deficiencies were 16 families who did not have adequate smoke detectors in their homes and 50 cases in which children shared a bed or slept in a non-bedroom area.

"Most cases can be remedied with adequate financial resources," the report concluded.

Pizzini said state officials have been working diligently on the issue for more than a year and criticized the federal government for its heavy penalty, saying there were lesser sanctions available.

But federal regulators and Schauffer, of the Youth Law Center said the state has not made any significant effort to meet federal guidelines, even though some remedies are fairly simple.

The Department of Social Services has yet to create and disperse a statewide standardized checklist for evaluating relatives' homes, as officials agreed to do in April, according to a federal letter.

The state has not provided any proof that homes have been approved using the new guidelines. And, despite a deadline of June to reassess the homes of all relatives providing foster care, thousands of homes have been checked.

"It was deliberately not done," said Schauffer, who says she plans to file the lawsuit this week. "It was either a financial or a philosophical position they were taking: Either we don't think relatives should be licensed, (that) they should be able to take care of their kids in any way they want. Or, if you look at it in a different way, neither the counties or the states way to pay the cost of having relatives assessed."

It is expensive.

In Sacramento County, officials created a kinship evaluation unit five months ago and staffed it with six social workers who were removed from units in which they were overseeing the care of children.

Child Protective Services Director Leland Tom said he is proud that the county has evaluated every relative's home but that the cost has been high.

"It's having a major impact on our workload," Tom said. "And the sticking point for counties has been, here is this additional workload that is being pushed on us, but we're not being given additional funding to do it."

Pizzini said the state also has concerns about the potential harm to children, given that the new process takes longer to complete, in some cases forcing children into the foster homes of strangers before relatives can be cleared. She said allowances need to be made.

"Grandmother and Uncle don't come into our office three months ahead of time and say, 'In the future, you're going to remove one of my nieces (from her home),' " she said. "That doesn't happen. On the other hand, we recruit strangers to come into care, and we have the luxury of some time."

SENATE—Tuesday, September 24, 2002

The Senate met at 9:25 a.m. and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Today's prayer will be offered by the guest Chaplain, the Reverend Cecil T. Washington, Jr., of the New Beginning Baptist Church in Topeka, KS.

The Reverend Mr. Washington, please.

PRAYER

The guest Chaplain offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, You said in Proverbs 14:34 that righteousness of character exalts a Nation and that lack of it brings disgrace.

Deliver this Nation from the poverty of a declining integrity, from the breaking down of ethics and morality. Infuse the economy of this Nation's soul with the blessed capital of richness in character.

As a master engraver imprints a character into metal, would You imprint into the spiritual mettle of these Senators the wisdom and goodness necessary to guide this country. Give them the grace to overcome any approaching disgrace.

As we look back at the Fathers of this Nation who were guided by Your sacred word, we can say, "Well done."

As our descendants look back over the work being done here, let them be able to say, "Well done," that we were guided by Your word.

Bless our President and the men and women of this Senate with the wisdom, courage, and boldness to shun ridicule and take a stand for righteousness. And when all political and personal correctness is finally judged, let us hear You say "Well done"—(Matt 25:21).

In the Name of Jesus, the Christ, thanks for hearing this prayer. Amen.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The Honorable ROBERT C. BYRD led the Pledge of Allegiance, as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, September 24, 2002.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, paragraph 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable DEBBIE STABENOW, a Senator from the State of Michigan, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Ms. STABENOW assumed the Chair as Acting President pro tempore.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that prior to the Chair announcing the business for the day, the Senator from Kansas, Mr. BROWNBACK, be recognized for up to 4 minutes. Following his statement, I ask unanimous consent that as soon as the Chair announces the legislation of today the time begin running.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BROWNBACK. Thank you very much, Madam President. Good morning. And I thank the Senator from Nevada for his recognition, and the Senator from West Virginia for allowing me to speak briefly.

WELCOMING GUEST CHAPLAIN REVEREND CECIL WASHINGTON

Mr. BROWNBACK. Madam President, I want to take a moment to recognize the guest Chaplain, Cecil Washington, from Topeka, KS. He has traveled here with his wife Audrey to be the guest Chaplain today. She is in the gallery.

I have had the pleasure of knowing Reverend Washington for many years. He has a distinguished record as not only a dedicated and caring minister but as a fellow traveler, helping those in need along the way in many places, as I have seen him do in Kansas and across the country.

Reverend Washington is deeply rooted in the Topeka community. He is committed to nurturing and guiding individuals in taking command and control of their lives.

In fact, Reverend Washington founded and is director of the Prayers Answered, Lives Saved Recovery Group, or PALS. This organization provides Bible-based, Christ-centered addiction support for all substance abuse users.

His organization has helped countless individuals redefine their lives and begin to make positive life choices for themselves and their loved ones.

Reverend Washington also knows the importance of self-sufficiency. He is the past president of Jobs Partnership of Topeka. He has worked tirelessly to help see that the individuals with whom he works develop the skills necessary to become self-sufficient and sustain their independence.

In addition, Reverend Washington has served in many capacities in the State of Kansas. He is the past Chaplain of both the State house of representatives and the State senate of Kansas. He has also served on a number of advisory committees and boards.

Currently, Reverend Washington is the pastor and founder of the New Beginning Missionary Baptist Church in Topeka, KS. He founded this church in March of 1998, which has a very expansive and growing congregation.

Finally, Reverend Washington is a sought-after minister, lecturer, and is the author of the book "The Triple Solution For Our Double A Problem," published in 2001. It is probably a good book for everybody to read to get a triple solution to double problems.

I am proud to have him here today. As I mentioned, he is joined by his wife.

I encourage Members of the Senate, as they come to the Chamber, if they get a chance, to meet Reverend Washington, I think they will be blessed. He has shared quite a testimony.

Some of you may recognize that he used to sing with Marvin Gaye, the Four Tops, and the Supremes. He has a voice, as you heard, and gave that for the ministry that the Lord might use it in another way. He is quite an individual and has been a good friend. I am glad to have him here as the guest Chaplain.

I have a statement I ask unanimous consent be printed in the RECORD from Congressman JIM RYUN of the second district in Kansas, which serves the Topeka area.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE JIM RYUN OF KANSAS

I am pleased that Pastor Cecil Washington is with us today and am grateful for his willingness to open the Senate Chamber in prayer.

Pastor Washington is an exemplary citizen and a strong role model. His contributions to the State of Kansas are commendable and I applaud him for his service.

Pastor Washington currently is the pastor of the New Beginning Baptist Church in Topeka, KS, and previously served as the Chaplain of the Kansas House of Representatives.

Pastor Washington, thank you for being here.

Mr. BROWNBACK. I yield the floor.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

HOMELAND SECURITY ACT OF 2002

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 5005, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5005) to establish the Department of Homeland Security, and for other purposes.

Pending:

Lieberman amendment No. 4471, in the nature of a substitute.

Byrd amendment No. 4644 (to amendment No. 4471), to provide for the establishment of the Department of Homeland Security, and an orderly transfer of functions to the Directorates of the Department.

Lieberman/McCain amendment No. 4694 (to amendment No. 4471), to establish the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

AMENDMENT NO. 4644

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. There are several speakers who will support my amendment, and each speaker has been allotted 5 minutes.

Will the Chair kindly remind each speaker when 4 minutes of the 5 have elapsed?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will do so.

Under the previous order, the Senator from North Dakota is recognized for up to 5 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN. Madam President, thank you very much.

I am pleased to be here to support the amendment offered by my colleague, the Senator from West Virginia, Mr. BYRD. This is a very important subject, the subject of homeland security. In some areas, if we make a mistake in the United States Congress, we waste money or some other inconvenience occurs or something important happens. But this is a case where if we make a mistake, the safety of the American people is at stake. So homeland security is critically important.

I have watched with great interest Senator BYRD's presentation of his amendment. Let me say this about my colleague from West Virginia. Much has been said about him. Let me say today that I think he is old-fashioned. That is right, I think he is old-fashioned. I think he brings to the floor, with this amendment, the values and virtues of being old-fashioned, saying: Yes, let's do it, but let's do it right.

I know that is old-fashioned to some. We live in kind of a turbo-charged world. We want what we want, and we want it right now. We are a world of fast food, Jiffy Lube, 1-hour cleaning, and Minute Rice. We want it this instant.

Senator BYRD brings to us a version of legislative home cooking, saying: Let's put all this together the right way. Let's make sure it is seasoned the right way because the safety and security of this country depends on it.

Senator BYRD's amendment does not change the deadlines by which we will provide homeland security, but he sets up weigh points by which we can work with the executive branch to create this new Department of Homeland Security. After all, we are talking about putting 170,000 people in a single agency—one single agency.

Some would say: Well, that is pretty easy to do. It is not easy to do at all. The development of a bureaucracy is always at odds and always creates tension with efficiency and effectiveness. Take a look at what has happened in recent days, the stories about the CIA and the FBI and the kind of work that was done, or not done, with respect to what they knew and did not know leading up to September 11.

It is very important we have agencies put together and locked together in a way that protects this country's interests, and especially that we have accountability. And that is where the Byrd amendment is so important.

The Byrd amendment will guarantee the accountability of all of the Department's activities because it will be assigned to one person. One person will be accountable for this agency as it is constructed: the Secretary of Homeland Security. I think that is very important to understand.

We are talking about putting together agencies, such as the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, Border Patrol, Transportation, security, Secret Service. This is a very big project.

Now, let me talk, just for a moment, about two very specific areas I am concerned about because they are part and parcel of this and why it is so important we get it right.

Port security in this country, homeland security/port security: We are going to spend $7 to $8 billion defending against an intercontinental ballistic missile that is going to come in at 14,000 miles an hour. People are worried a terrorist or a rogue nation is going to get ahold of an ICBM, so we will spend $7 to $8 billion on that in the Defense bill this year. But it is far more likely that a weapon of mass destruction will come into a port, in a container, on a container ship, and pull up to that port at 2 miles per hour.

We have 5.7 million containers coming into our ports every year and 5.6 million are not inspected. Dealing with that has to be a part of homeland security. That is why we have to get this right.

What Senator BYRD is suggesting in this amendment is not that we should delay the creation of homeland security. It is that, as we move along to the 13 months, we, in fact, create weigh points so we can measure what we are doing, what the President is doing, what the administration is doing.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has used 4 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN. It is very much like when you learn to fly. I learned to fly with a private plane once. When you fly, you fly the weigh points you establish out there. This legislation says: Yes, let's have a Homeland Security Department. Let's meet the deadline, do it on time, but let's do it right. And it establishes weigh points by which the Congress becomes a full partner with the administration in developing and making sure that we implement properly the Homeland Security Department.

If we make a mistake here, it is about the security of the United States of America. This is not about wasting money. It is about this country's security. That is why this amendment is so important.

People say: Well, this amendment guts the bill coming out of the committee. It does not do anything of the sort. This bill improves it. And this bill gives Congress the role it ought to have with the administration to make homeland security work for the United States of America.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Maryland is recognized for up to 5 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I rise in support of the Byrd amendment and urge my colleagues to back this very important amendment. But I also rise to thank the very able Senator from West Virginia for his firm and constant leadership on this very important issue. I particularly appreciate the careful way in which he has formulated this amendment.

This amendment actually would achieve the establishment of the Department within the same timeframe that is contained in the bill brought from the committee.

The only difference is it would do it in stages and would give the Congress a continuing role to examine carefully how this is being done, how the directorates are put into place, and would give us a better chance to carefully examine the full range of implications of many of the important principles, including worker protections, civil liberties, privacy, secrecy, and which functions to transfer and how they should be transferred.

This is an enormous undertaking. The Senator from West Virginia has made a singular contribution in developing the potential ramifications and consequences of that with which we are dealing.

Senator BYRD is given to quoting Roman history. A lot of my colleagues tend to consider that as interesting but not always directly relevant. I disagree. I think he reaches back and draws out lessons which are of extreme importance to us. I particularly like the quote he used in this debate of Gaius Petronius Arbiter, who was an adviser to Nero:

> We trained hard . . . but it seems that every time we were beginning to form into teams, we would be reorganized. I was to learn later in life that we tend to meet any new situation by reorganizing; and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion, inefficiency, and demoralization.

What an apt quotation as we consider the important issue before us today.

The Baltimore Sun ran an editorial actually concluding that they were against establishing the Department of Homeland Security. Senator BYRD's amendment does not do that. Senator BYRD is prepared to establish the Department, but he wants to be very careful in how we do it. The Sun, in that editorial, pointed out that in trying to establish this Department, we are taking the focus off the need for tighter oversight of the Nation's security systems; that shifting 22 Federal agencies and 170,000 employees is a massive undertaking, and it needs to be done very carefully.

That is what the Senator from West Virginia has stressed again and again. We need congressional involvement which will help to ensure that we will craft the best possible legislation.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has used 4 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. Additional oversight is required in order to assure that this is done in the right manner. We have agencies with multiple functions. Some relate to homeland security; some do not. How are we going to accommodate that complexity? The Byrd amendment, by requiring further timely participation of the Congress, will give us the opportunity for additional scrutiny to ensure that a massive governmental reorganization is done carefully and effectively. We do not want to create chaos and confusion which will set us back in our efforts to deal with homeland security.

The Senator from West Virginia has underscored how carefully we did the National Security Act that reorganized the Department of Defense. That is not being done in this instance. I very strongly support this amendment and urge my colleagues to back it.

I ask unanimous consent the Sun editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 23, 2002]

BOONDOGGLED

At the risk of sounding heretical, it's time to pull the plug on the plan to create a Department of Homeland Security. Better yet, drive a stake through its heart.

Months of debate have made clear that this bureaucratic boondoggle offers no promise of making the homeland more secure. Worse, it takes the focus off the need for tighter oversight of the nation's security systems.

President Bush offered the most sweeping government reorganization in a half-century largely as a political and public relations tactic. He was trying to counter Senate Democrats who were advancing similar legislation of their own.

He timed the unveiling of his plan to drown out the testimony of FBI Agent Coleen M. Rowley, who was blowing the whistle on the security failures of her hidebound agency that blinded it to clues of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Shifting 22 federal agencies and 170,000 workers into a new department will cost billions but will do nothing to solve the problems Agent Rowley addressed. What's needed is greater sharing, and coordination and synthesis of the security information collected by the myriad agencies.

But this new department would not even include the FBI and the CIA, which are the two premier intelligence gatherers. Nor is there any guarantee that greater sharing would take place between them if they were together.

The FBI, and Drug Enforcement Administration and the Immigration and Naturalization Service are already grouped together in the Justice Department, and they don't have a system for streamlined communications. As Agent Rowley told Congress, the various offices of the FBI didn't even share information with each other.

For the nation's security apparatus to become more efficient, the psychology and culture of those competitive and turf-protective agencies must change. Moving boxes around on an organizational chart and creating cement edifices to house them will do nothing but create more pork-barrel booty for lawmakers eager for new facilities in their home states.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, a Maryland Democrat who opposes creation of the department, contends the homeland security oversight job could be done by upgrading the White House advisor post now held by Tom Ridge. The main reason Senate Democrats started pushing the idea of a new department was their frustration with Mr. Ridge's refusal to submit to their questioning on the grounds that he was a confidential presidential aide.

Few lawmakers have openly opposed this sacred cow. The proposal whisked through the House in a matter of hours before the summer recess. It is bogged down in the Senate largely because of a partisan dispute over worker rules.

Mr. Bush is taking advantage of the opportunity to mow down longstanding worker rights and protections, saying he needs greater flexibility to hire, fire and move workers around.

That alone is a good reason to deep-six this plan. Civil service laws may well need some updating to attract and retain a quality work force. But the changes should be carefully applied throughout the government to avoid creating a class system in which workers at some agencies are treated better than those at others.

This Congress will leave much unfinished business. With any luck, that will include this pointless bureaucratic reshuffling.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Minnesota is recognized for up to 5 minutes.

Mr. WELLSTONE. Madam President, I am pleased to support the Byrd amendment. I thank Senator JOSEPH LIEBERMAN for his fine work. He was talking about a Department of Homeland Security long before the administration and understood the need.

I believe the Byrd amendment is a key improvement.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for 10 seconds?

Mr. WELLSTONE. I am pleased to.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to underscore what the Senator said. Senator LIEBERMAN has done fine work on this legislation. It is no detraction from Senator LIEBERMAN's fine efforts to support the Byrd amendment. In fact, I think the two can be perceived as being complementary.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. WELLSTONE. I thank the Senator from Maryland. His remarks reinforce what all of us believe.

The Byrd amendment would allow for a more orderly transition of authorities to a new Homeland Security Department than the underlying bill would otherwise provide for. I support the underlying bill, and I commend the chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee and others for their work on it. Long before the Administration concluded that a single new Federal department could best protect our domestic security, the committee and its chairman, Senator LIEBERMAN, developed the framework for such a department. Now that framework is essentially the bill we have before us. It is a good framework, but I believe this amendment is a key improvement.

This bill authorizes the largest reorganization of Federal Government functions undertaken in half a century. While we have been debating the bill for several weeks, I agree with the Senator from West Virginia that it is a task that warrants deliberation and care. It is the right of Congress to participate deeply both in creating the framework for this needed new department, but also in overseeing key details of the transition to it. Indeed, in my view, we have not only the right to participate. We have an obligation.

The Byrd amendment would allow immediate creation of a new Homeland Security Department. It would immediately establish the superstructure of the Secretary and the six directorates as outlined by the Lieberman substitute, and then require that the administration submit three separate legislative proposals to transfer agencies and functions to the new Department. This would give Congress the opportunity to gauge and modify how the new Department is being implemented, while it drafts legislation to transfer additional functions and agencies and would provide Congress with additional means to head off problems that traditionally plague and delay massive reorganizations. What's more, under the Byrd amendment, Congress would be required to act on these legislative proposals within 13 months on enactment, which is roughly the same time period outlined by the Lieberman plan.

Once the Department of Homeland Security is established, the Secretary will submit legislative proposals and recommendations for the orderly transfer of agencies and functions, based on the Department's actual needs in carrying out its mission.

Through additional involvement in the implementation of agency transfers and reorganizations, Congress will be able to exercise meaningful oversight after the enactment of homeland security legislation.

The Byrd amendment gives Congress a much-needed opportunity to review more thoroughly the details of the reorganization during the one-year transition period established in the Lieberman bill.

Congress can use this time to consider specific agency transfers, worker protection policies, new intelligence authority, and constitutional protections, instead of handing off unresolved questions for the President and the Secretary to answer.

Under the Byrd amendment, Congress will receive better information from the administration during the implementation the Lieberman bill, including the criteria used by the administration in choosing which agencies and functions to transfer into the Department.

The Byrd amendment guides us towards a more rational approach for undertaking the task of creating the new department, and I support it. Protecting the American homeland is not just President Bush's responsibility. It is our responsibility as well. And it is the responsibility of future Presidents and future Congresses. So we must make sure that we do everything within our power now to create the very best structure to protect our's and future generations.

As I have said, Madam President, the Byrd amendment will allow for the immediate creation of a new Homeland Security Department. It is important to understand that. There is no delay, and we have the same basic legislative time period of 13 months. Once the Department of Homeland Security is established, the Secretary will submit legislative proposals and recommendations for the orderly transfer of agencies and functions based on the Department's actual needs in carrying on its mission. Through additional involvement in the implementation of the agency transfers and reorganizations, Congress will be able to exercise meaningful oversight after the enactment of homeland security legislation.

That is what is so important about the Byrd amendment. It guides us toward a more rational approach to the undertaking of the task of creating a new Department. I support it.

Protecting the American homeland is not just President Bush's responsibility or any President's responsibility; it is our responsibility as well. It is the responsibility of future Presidents and future Congresses.

We must do everything within our power now to create the very best structure to protect our future and that of our children and grandchildren. I believe the Byrd amendment is a positive contribution.

Senator BYRD plays a key, indispensable role. Senator BYRD has been on the floor week after week calling on all of us to exercise our constitutional responsibility; talking about the importance of legislative involvement, the importance of checks and balances, the importance of deliberation, the importance of understanding full well the consequences of what we do.

The Senator from West Virginia deserves a tremendous amount of credit for his exceptional work as a Senator. I am very pleased to support the amendment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from California is recognized for up to 5 minutes.

Mrs. BOXER. Madam President, I thank Senator BYRD for allowing me to take some of this time. It is truly an honor for me to rise on behalf of his amendment.

If ever there has been a more fierce, more forthright defender of the Constitution and the responsibilities we have as Senators, I can think of none other.

Clearly, what we have before us is a bill crafted by Senator LIEBERMAN which is far better than what has come out of the House, far better than what the administration put forward. There is no question in my mind that Senator LIEBERMAN has taken us forward.

I have to say, as someone who has been in office for many years, I have come to be very skeptical about a huge reshuffling of agencies in Government and huge moves without lots of time to look at the ramifications. My belief is that in moving so quickly to such a large reshuffling, we are going to bring about less accountability, not more, in terms of how this Government functions.

Senator BYRD is saying, yes, we need to create this Department. Let's bring forward some of the best and brightest people to begin to put it together. But let's slow down; let's take a deep breath. Let's make sure what we are doing is going to result in more protection for the American people, more efficiency on behalf of these departments, not less.

I am also very concerned about the movement away from rights for people who will work in this Department. Senator LIEBERMAN has been very strong, and I hope he will prevail, but I am very concerned that more than 40,000 people in this new Department who do not deal directly with national security—they may be, for example, a secretary, a file clerk, someone who works in that Department—are going to lose worker protections.

I have said before, and I will reiterate it today, that it is a very cynical move, I believe a grab of power on behalf of this administration, to do that to these people. Doesn't the President have more things to occupy himself—and I know he does—than worrying about whether a secretary or a file clerk has the ability to say to the people who supervise her, through her union, through her bargaining unit: I need a better salary; I need better health care; explain to me what my work rules will be? I do not think any President—this one or any future one—should interfere with that. It is very important that people have their dignity.

On the one hand, we have the President saying he is creating this new Department and it is so important; on the other hand, what is the first thing he wants to do? He wants to strip away the rights of people.

In California over the weekend, I spoke to working men and women, maybe about a thousand of them. I pointed out to them what I have pointed out in this Chamber—and others have pointed it out, too—that the real heroes of 9/11 were not politicians, were not any Senators or Members of Congress. Certainly not. And certainly not anyone sitting in the Oval Office or in the Old Executive Office Building.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has used 4 minutes.

Mrs. BOXER. Madam President, do I have 1 minute remaining?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mrs. BOXER. Madam President, the real heroes of 9/11 were working men and women, and they did not look at their watch and say: Gee, am I working overtime? They just went into those burning buildings. That is important.

Mr. President, when I first read the details of the President's Homeland Security Department proposal, I was concerned. And when the House leadership passed the President's proposal without so much as a second glance, I was dismayed.

Instead of a creating a blueprint for enhanced domestic security and more efficient Government, the President and a handful of others have created a patchwork proposal.

The legislation created by Senator LIEBERMAN stands in distinct contrast to the House-passed bill.

I believe the amendment proposed by Senator BYRD builds upon and strengthens the good work of Senator LIEBERMAN and his committee. The Byrd amendment provides for the creation of a Department of Homeland Security—just as the Lieberman bill does. But, instead of immediately moving agencies into the new Department's directorates, the administration would be required to come back to Congress—and to the relevant House and Senate oversight committees—with detailed legislative proposals before any transition actually occurs.

Many questions remain unanswered about this Department of Homeland Security. The Byrd amendment would require the President and his advisors to address these questions before agencies are moved into the new Department.

If we grant the administration the statutory powers it is demanding without first passing the Byrd amendment and making it part of the final bill we send to the President, we will lose the support, I believe, to get it right.

The Byrd amendment would also ensure that the implementation of the Department occurs in a more thoughtful way, with more openness and less secrecy.

I will conclude in this way: I am proud to support Senator BYRD's amendment. I hope my colleagues will do so, too. It retains the checks and balances that are so important and that our Founders told us we must do. It also will result in a Department that will be well thought out and that means it will, in fact, protect the people of this country in a much better way than we are being protected today.

I thank the Chair very much and yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Washington, Ms. CANTWELL, is recognized for up to 5 minutes.

Ms. CANTWELL. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, I rise today in support of the Byrd amendment to ensure the proper deliberation and congressional oversight in the creation of the Department of Homeland Security. While I applaud the chairman and ranking member for working to develop changes in our Federal system to better harden our defenses against potential terrorism targets, and to create effective, integrated protections, we must not allow the task of government reorganization to distract us from our vulnerabilities.

I think it is particularly timely that we are on the floor debating how to protect ourselves from the future of any kind of 9/11 attacks while the Intelligence Committee is discussing the implications of its report that demonstrates how the primary weakness is not the fact we did not have a 170,000-person Federal agency.

Instead, we are learning that the men and women of our intelligence community neither have the resources nor the adequate mechanisms in place to communicate and to share information and to connect the dots before an attack happened.

I urge my colleagues to remember, while creation of a Homeland Security Department is an important step, which I believe is about hardening our targets and creating redundancy, we cannot ignore the primary challenge we are facing in intelligence gathering.

Similarly, any forward movement in strengthening our homeland security must not also distract us from our constitutionally mandated responsibilities to provide the necessary oversight and adequate deliberation in the enormous process of creating a new Department.

Make no mistake, we are currently considering some giant and unprecedented changes to our Federal system:

We are radically reshaping our Federal Government to meet new goals.

We are contemplating dramatic—and I think fundamentally unwise—changes to important civil service laws.

We are deliberating substantial changes to the roles and missions of many important agencies that provide important functions for our country.

We are even considering unprecedented changes in the relationship between Congress and the administration by handing over substantial aspects of our constitutionally derived authority to shape and form the functions of Government.

Despite the enormity of this effort and its implications, some have criticized the Senate for not rushing this legislation through this body. I submit that these critics are wrong. We are accountable to our constituents for good, thoughtful legislation—not the rate at which we pass a bill.

Our Founding Fathers created an ingenious system of Government that stresses deliberation as the only rational method to ensure sound decisionmaking.

This piece of legislation—perhaps the most important, wide-ranging legislation that has come before the Senate in recent years—deserves thoughtful consideration that is absolutely necessary in putting together this new agency.

That is exactly what Senator BYRD is proposing that we do. I thank the distinguished President pro tempore for his effort in stressing the importance of this responsibility.

The Byrd amendment will strengthen Senator LIEBERMAN's bill by sending the message that this body is committed to creating a Department of Homeland Security with a mission to protect the American people and with the clear determination that we will act responsibly in doing so because we want to get it right. This is critically important because it would require the implementation of the new Department to be considered by Congress.

The Byrd amendment ensures that the important first step is followed by a process that will ensure that Congress and the Nation are involved in asking the right questions when it comes to the specific details of this reorganization, including the specific agencies and responsibilities that need to be transferred, the personnel strategies that need to be implemented, and a wide array of other logistical issues.

Any reorganization of this magnitude is difficult and complex. I can tell you, having been in the private sector, I have seen a lot of reorganizations in the private sector that don't go as smoothly as people want them to. And on a much larger scale, this proposal, I believe, deserves the kind of attention this amendment gives it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 4 minutes.

Ms. CANTWELL. Madam President, I think there are two fundamental examples in this bill. One of them is the Coast Guard—I am sure my colleague from Washington will expound on this—which is being transferred. The critical mission of that agency needs to be secured and understood as that agency is transferred. The other is an important opportunity within the National Institute of Standards and Technology with the Computer Security Division—again, a key mission that is being met for the private sector in creating technology standards that may be transferred, and that mission may be lost.

In summary, it is critically important that we not rush to make these changes and then believe we have delivered service to the American people. Let them be sure we are involved in guaranteeing that this agency is hardening our targets and strengthening our redundancy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Washington, Mrs. MURRAY, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. MURRAY. Madam President, for the past several weeks we have been talking about the proposal to create a Department of Homeland Security. I think it is very clear that there are a lot of details that still need to be worked out.

I thank Senator BYRD for his leadership and his patience in raising the questions that must be raised to improve our security and our safety.

I want to make sure we don't just "do something" about security, but that we do the right thing. Let's face it, it takes time to get the simple things right. I have been working with the Transportation Security Administration now for months on airline security and we still have not worked out all of the issues. It took a long time for us to get the National Guard to deploy to our northern border. In creating this new Department, I want to make sure we get it right.

Three weeks ago, I spoke on the Senate floor and raised a number of questions, and at this point I am still troubled by the lack of answers I have received. There are many different ways to set up this Department. The President has offered one way. His proposal was created in a short amount of time by a few officials meeting at the White House in secret. We don't know how the President's proposal will balance the security and the economic needs of the American people.

As I have stated before, I have two major concerns. First, we have not yet figured out how to fulfill our traditional missions and the new security missions at the same time. If we combine these various agencies into one massive Homeland Security Department, how are we going to meet the traditional mission?

Just look at the Coast Guard. Since September 11, the Coast Guard has shifted resources away from their traditional missions to homeland defense. That is an appropriate response, but it comes at a cost. What the shift in resources means to the average American is that the Coast Guard is now spending less time interdicting drugs and illegal immigrants, enforcing fishery and marine safety laws, and protecting our marine environment. Yet the need for the Coast Guard to perform these vital missions is as important today as it was before the attack on our country.

Unfortunately, we have not figured out how to effectively carry out both missions at the same time. I would like to know how one massive Department, focused primarily on security, will more effectively address all of our safety and security needs.

Secondly, I am very concerned about how this new Department will function. The administration has asked for unprecedented power and control over this proposed Department. The President wants to change the personnel rules so he can have what he calls flexibility. From what I understand, the administration already has flexibility under current law.

In addition to dramatic new controls over workers, the administration wants the power to move money around without congressional input. From what I have seen so far, that is pretty scary news for families in my State of Washington.

Right now, I can fight to make sure that the needs in my State are being met. But if the administration gets this unprecedented authority, then accountants in the Office of Management and Budget will decide what is important to the people in my home State. If that happens, my constituents are going to lose out—at a cost to their safety and their security.

So we need to better understand and define all of the missions in the various agencies. We need to make sure they continue to fulfill their traditional missions. That is why I support the Byrd amendment. It will allow us to move forward in a pragmatic manner that allows us to do this right. It is essential for our economic security and our future safety.

I urge my colleagues to support the Byrd amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. LIEBERMAN, is recognized to speak for up to 5 minutes.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, for literally more than a year now, the bipartisan membership of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee has been working to strengthen our homeland security, particularly and intensely after the events of September 11 which showed the extent to which the disorganization of Federal homeland security activities created vulnerabilities of which the terrorists took advantage.

The amendment offered by the great Senator from West Virginia is the most direct challenge the committee's work will face in this debate because it puts at issue the question not only of the approach the committee has taken in creating the Department but whether we in the Senate believe it is urgently necessary to have a Department of Homeland Security, a better organized Federal Government to protect the American people anytime soon.

This amendment will retain the basic administrative structure of the Department as we have proposed, but that is all. The amendment nominally sets up the same six directorates as the Governmental Affairs Committee proposal, but that is where the similarity ends.

Here is an example: We created a directorate for emergency preparedness and response. Our Committee proposal transfers six distinct agencies, or sets of programs, and includes more than seven pages of legislative text specifying the missions and operating provisions of the directorate. The parallel provision in Senator BYRD's amendment, section 134, found on page 37 of that amendment, consists of not seven pages but seven lines of text. Three creates the directorate, and four authorizes an Under Secretary to run it. But that is all. No goals, no missions, no duties, no programs, no personnel, no directorate in any real sense. That is the approach taken by this amendment for all of the directorates, with the exception of Immigration, where the amendment does not disturb our provision to transfer and restructure the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

For example, our provisions regarding a new division of intelligence would immediately begin building a potent new capability to analyze all information regarding terrorist threats and disseminate the information to help prevent or protect against attacks.

The Intelligence Directorate in the Byrd amendment is an empty room with a name on the door, awaiting future legislation to give it staff and purpose; and so it would remain, I fear, indefinitely, because there is no effective termination point, no effective implementation point in the amendment's structure.

Section 139 of the Byrd amendment calls for the Secretary of the new Department to submit to Congress over the course of the next year a series of legislative proposals for these shell directorates, including recommendations for the transfer of authorities, functions, personnel, assets, agencies, or entities, all of which would fill them up and give them some meaning.

Those recommendations are to be submitted to Congress at least 4 months apart, beginning no sooner than February 3, 2003—next year. That means that, at best, Congress would have the administration's proposals a year from now—a year to recreate proposals that we have before us today.

The amendment states that Congress should take action on these proposals within 13 months of enactment of the underlying homeland security legislation. But even if this deadline were heeded, it means only that Congress would take some action. Congress could reject one or more of the proposals or vote to study the matter further. The fact is that it is very hard to bind a future Congress to do anything. So at the end of the year, under the committee's proposal, that is the deadline for this Department to be fully up and running. Thirty days after the President signs legislation under our proposal, the new Secretary would have the power to start getting the Department running. A lot of it would start rapidly, but it would all be done within a year.

Within a year, under the Byrd amendment, there is nothing but the hope that Congress will react to the proposals the administration will have sent it. So with the exception of immigration functions, there would be no assurance in the end that anything would ever be transferred into the new Department. It could indefinitely remain a bare-bones proposal with no meat on its skeletal frame whatsoever.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Vermont is recognized to speak for up to 5 minutes.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Madam President, let me begin by commending Senator LIEBERMAN for leading this debate. I appreciate the hard work the Senator from Connecticut, the Governmental Affairs Committee, and the staff put into this important legislation.

I rise today to support the amendment of the homeland security legislation that has been proposed by my colleague from West Virginia, Senator BYRD.

I am concerned about the path we are proceeding down to create this new Department, and I doubt that the result of this flawed process will adequately address the intelligence failures that were revealed so tragically on September 11, 2001.

Congress must not cede its constitutional role and responsibilities to the executive branch in this dramatic Government reorganization. Congress must remain engaged in this effort to ensure it results in a functioning, effective agency.

This mandate is made clearer when we compare the current process with similar reorganizations in the past.

For instance, comparisons have been drawn between this legislation and the creation of the Department of Defense. But the creation of the Department of Defense involved a collaborative process between the executive branch and the Congress. And the executive branch agencies affected by the proposed Department were participants in the process.

Thus, the Department of Defense was founded upon discussion, debate, and compromise.

This cooperative approach to developing a workable new Department contrasts starkly with the way the administration developed its homeland security draft legislation.

A small group of advisers working in secret within the White House developed President Bush's proposal. Members of Congress and Secretaries of the affected cabinet agencies were reportedly not even informed about the proposal until the days before it was unveiled.

And even now, rather than working with Congress to develop consensus on this legislation, the administration insists it will veto any proposal that does not closely resemble its own.

Of specific concern, the administration's proposal does not place enough emphasis on correcting what went wrong prior to September 11. I firmly hope that we, as a Nation, will develop a comprehensive plan to address the shortcomings in our intelligence gathering and communication efforts.

Because of the similarity of the September 11 attacks and the attack on Pearl Harbor over 60 years ago, we should remember the finding of the Joint Congressional Committee that investigated Pearl Harbor.

That Committee found that ". . . the security of the Nation can be insured only through . . . centralization of responsibility in those charged with handling intelligence."

I hope we will learn our lesson after the tragic events of September 11. Correcting intelligence failures must be the hallmark of any new Department of Homeland Security.

This reorganization will affect the lives of everyday Americans for years to come. Because the President's proposal does not adequately address intelligence failures, and because the administration refuses to enter into a constructive dialogue with the Congress regarding legitimate disagreements, we have a constitutional responsibility to act.

Therefore, I support Senator BYRD's amendment to the homeland security legislation. The Byrd amendment will go a long way toward ensuring Congress continues to play a constructive role in shaping the new Department as this process moves forward.

I commend the Senator from West Virginia for his help and assistance in helping us all to better understand this problem.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON of Nebraska). Under the previous order, the Senator from Michigan is recognized to speak for up to 5 minutes.

Ms. STABENOW. Mr. President, I acknowledge, as other colleagues have, the important work of the Senator from Connecticut. Senator LIEBERMAN was the first to outline the reasons for bringing together all of the essential functions of Government that relate to homeland security. I know he has put literally hundreds of hours into this effort, and we thank him for that.

I support the Byrd amendment as an addition to this effort, not as a detraction, because I believe what Senator BYRD has articulated is a very important part of the way we put together a Department of Homeland Security. I think it is essential. So while I support the homeland security effort, I believe it is important to move forward along the timelines and with the checks and balances that Senator BYRD so thoughtfully has put together.

Simply put, the mission of this Department is too important to be rushed into law. I know the Senator from Connecticut would say that after months and months it does not seem like rushing; that there has been a tremendous amount of effort that has gone into this. But as that is said, I also know it is a huge task bringing together 170,000 employees, and there are many questions about the various departments, so this is something that will take continued time and thoughtfulness to be able to put together.

There are many questions that remain, and if the public is to have confidence in the new Department, those questions need to be answered. For instance, why are certain agencies being transferred into the new Department? What criteria are the administration using to determine what agencies should be transferred? Almost all of these agencies being transferred have other functions not related to homeland security, which is of great concern in Michigan—this has been raised in a number of contexts—and how will those functions be separated? How will they be affected?

In Michigan, we have concerns about the Coast Guard, which is a very important part of our operations not only in fighting terrorism but we want to make sure there are sufficient resources to deter terrorists from coming into our country by boat. We also know there is a critical role in search and rescue operations and ship inspections. We want to make sure in Michigan we do not lose resources for those essential civilian functions as well as the important efforts to fight terrorism.

In earlier discussions about the Homeland Security Department, the Department of Agriculture's Animal and Plant Health Inspection System, or APHIS, would have been moved to the Homeland Security Department. While it is reasonable that the border inspection mission of APHIS would be a part of the new Department, it is also critical the domestic mission of protecting animal and plant health, and ultimately the health of American consumers, remains within the Department of Agriculture. If the full transfer of APHIS comes up again, I would like to debate and vote on that.

Those are the kinds of issues I am concerned about. We have workforce questions. There are a number of issues that have been raised which I believe need our continual input, and that is why I support the timeframe that has been put together in the Byrd amendment to create the Department without delay but then to come back to the Congress, receive input, take it step by step to make sure we are, in fact, doing it right. That is what the Byrd amendment is all about. It is about creating this Department with input feedback, coordination, and cooperation that is going to enable us to do this huge job.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 4 minutes.

Ms. STABENOW. I believe the Byrd amendment is a more disciplined process that will help us create a Department that is cohesive, responsive, and effective with its duties and missions clearly defined. I urge my colleagues to join with so many of us in supporting the Byrd amendment.

I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Under the order that was entered last night, Senator BYRD had requested 10 minutes. We all thought it was 5 minutes, but I think it is appropriate he have the 10 minutes. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that Senator LIEBERMAN be extended another 5 minutes to balance out that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under the previous order, the Senator from West Virginia is recognized to speak for up to 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is my understanding Senator THOMPSON wants to speak. I ask the Chair to alert me when I have consumed 4 minutes and when I have consumed 5 minutes. I hope by the time I use 5 minutes Mr. THOMPSON will be in the Chamber so the other side can be heard, I can then speak, and then Mr. LIEBERMAN can close out the debate.

I congratulate Mr. LIEBERMAN, the Governmental Affairs Committee, and all of the staff members of that committee. They have worked hard, they have worked long, and they have produced a bill that is, in my judgment, a great improvement over the House bill.

My amendment only addresses title I of the Governmental Affairs bill. The other titles are not touched by my amendment.

What does my amendment do? My amendment substitutes for title I in the Lieberman bill in a way that provides congressional oversight and a systematic and orderly process by which the agencies are transferred into the new Department.

My amendment provides for the creation of a Department of Homeland Security. My amendment provides for the same superstructure as does the Lieberman amendment: in other words, the same directorates in title I and the same number of Under Secretaries, Assistant Secretaries, and so on. Those are how the two titles, title I in the Lieberman bill and title I in the Byrd amendment, are the same. What is the difference, then? The difference is my amendment provides for an orderly process whereby, in every 120 days over the next 13 months, there will be a transfer of agencies into the Department. So these will occur at 120-day intervals, unlike the Lieberman bill, which provides for the wholesale transfer over the next 13 months; it could come early, it could come late, it could come earlier than 90 days after the passage of the bill, or it could come as late as the close of the transition period, which is 12 months following the first 30 days.

Mr. LIEBERMAN says the Department will be up and running in 13 months under his legislation. But his legislation requires only that agencies be transferred by the conclusion of the 13 months. It doesn't say they will be up and running. His bill in that respect is exactly like my amendment. Both the Lieberman bill and the Byrd amendment provide for the conclusions of the transfers of agencies over the 13 months—by the end of the transition period, which is the end of the 13 months.

Neither his bill nor my amendment provides that the Department will be "up and running," as the distinguished Senator has said. No legislation can guarantee when the Department will be "up and running." It will likely be years, which is why Congress needs to ensure a continuing role for itself.

So there will be an orderly process under the Byrd amendment, and the chaos that will occur under the Lieberman proposal will be avoided.

Congress is kept involved under the Byrd amendment, which means that the Lieberman committee will be kept involved. My amendment provides for the protection of employee rights, privacy, and civil liberties. How does it do that? Because Congress stays involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 4 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Congress is involved. Mr. LIEBERMAN's committee will be involved time and again—once, twice, three times. So Congress will be there, looking over the shoulder of the agencies, so to speak, looking over the shoulder of the administration, looking over the shoulder of the President. The President has said he needs flexibility.

We hear that worker rights will be challenged, will be jeopardized. That is not true under my amendment because of the fact that Congress will always be there, looking over the shoulders of those who would be acting to constitute the agency transfers.

Time and again, the workers' rights will be under surveillance because Congresses will not pass this bill and then walk away, as would be the case in the Lieberman bill, in which instance the Congress would pass the bill now, and then for the next 13 months——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 5 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. Over the next 13 months, Congress would walk away to the sidelines.

So under my amendment, we are not going to say: Mr. President, here is the bill. You take it. Just report back to us from time to time and let us know how it is working. Congress is not going to relegate itself to a zero. Congress is going to be involved. Congress will be there to protect worker rights, to protect privacy, to protect civil liberties.

So I urge the Senators to vote for my amendment. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I yield up to 5 minutes of the time I have to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues again for their eloquent statements on behalf of their positions. I think the issue with regard to this amendment has been well clarified because of those statements. I think it is pretty obvious now that there is almost unanimity that we need to proceed with the homeland security bill—unanimity in this body. There is disagreement as to whether we ought to get about doing it or whether we should delay it. I think that is the fundamental issue with regard to this amendment.

This amendment that has been offered by the Senator from West Virginia would basically postpone the implementation of the new Department for at least a year. The President's proposals in the House and Senate bills all establish directorates. They list responsibilities, transfer funds to agencies.

Senator BYRD strikes from the Lieberman substitute all language spelling out responsibilities and transfers of functions for each directorate, leaving only language establishing each directorate under an Under Secretary. Instead, he requires the administration to provide legislative proposals in the future, no sooner than February of 2003 for border and transportation, no sooner than 120 days later for intelligence and for critical infrastructure, and no sooner than 120 days after that for emergency preparedness and science and technology.

The overall thrust is to delay implementation of this bill. The question we have to ask ourselves is whether we believe, in the exercise of our responsibilities as representatives of the people of our States, that that is the thing to do, that is where we are. I suggest we already have legislative proposals before us that the Senator from West Virginia would have the administration produce sometime next year.

We in government, especially those in the Governmental Affairs Committee, have been watching and listening and discussing for years the way the Government in many respects is dysfunctional. It has been created and added onto little by little over the years. It needs reorganization in the worst sort of way. We have been listening and watching and discussing the fact that the threat to our country from rogue nations and from terrorists is growing and growing and growing. This is not new information to any of us.

The disorganization of government and the growing threat of especially nuclear proliferation have been things that have been before this body for years and years and years. Unfortunately, it takes something like September 11 to get us activated so we even have a discussion such as this.

Now we have a proposal that says essentially we are moving too fast, although commissions started telling us 2 years ago what we needed to do. We started having hearings a year ago with regard to what we needed to do, and we have had 18 hearings on homeland security in the Governmental Affairs Committee alone and dozens of other hearings in the House and the Senate.

Is it really too rapid? Are we really moving too fast? Is that a criticism that is a just accusation to this body: That we are speeding this thing along, at long last, after all the information and hearings and GAO reports that you could stack as high as your head about the problems with Government and the way it needs to be reorganized and needs to be more efficient, that we have too much waste and fraud and abuse and mismanagement and overlap and duplication—for years and years, and nobody paid any attention to it?

Now we are finally getting around to addressing some of this, and the issue before us is whether or not we need to wait at least another year before we even start doing those things. I suggest we do not. I suggest we need to get on about it. I suggest obviously there are going to be a lot of twists and turns in the road.

We have seen amendments to the Department of Energy Act recently. We have seen DoD amendments in 1985, major amendments, Goldwater-Nickles. Major pieces of legislation creating major departments or consolidated departments always produce the need to revisit those issues at a subsequent time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 5 minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for an additional 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may continue.

Mr. THOMPSON. I suggest Congress is not going to lose its oversight. It has been under Congress's oversight, I might add, that this duplication, waste, fraud, abuse, mismanagement, and civil service system, which the Brookings Institution and representatives there say fails and underwhelms in every task it takes—it has been under our supervision that that has been created. With the appropriations process and the oversight process, if we do it correctly—not the way we have necessarily done it in the past; if we do it correctly—Congress will have a firm hand as we go down the road in the creation and the implementation of this new Department.

It is not because we are moving too fast or because of any structural deficiencies that Congress has not had the proper hand. It is because we just simply have not done it. I suggest it is about time we did it. The creation of this Department is the first step in that regard.

I had a conversation recently with Alexander Giacco, the former chairman of the board of Hercules, Incorporated. Mr. Giacco, although not taking a position on this amendment, impressed upon me the difficulty of wholesale organizational change, of the importance of getting such a structural upheaval right, and it is his comments which in part guide my vote this morning.

Senator BYRD has it right. Senator BYRD warned us months ago that a Department of Homeland Security was needed, but that the way to create such a massive new structure was not to rush into a new flow chart without asking questions first. The way to do this job right is to be deliberate, to be thoughtful, and to ask the tough questions about how our Federal agencies will interact so as to better protect the Nation. Senator BYRD's amendment gets us to a new Department as quickly as does the President's proposal and as does the proposal reported favorably by the Committee on Governmental Affairs in July.

It is important for us first to understand all that has been done since September 11 to boost our homeland defenses. In the 12 months since the attacks, the President and the Congress have moved with dispatch. The President created the Office of Homeland Security and selected the able Tom Ridge as its head. I was proud to work with my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee to draft the USA Patriot Act. That bill was a long overdue strengthening of our laws against terror. It increased the ability of law enforcement to share information, facilitated the sharing of information from criminal investigations, and reconsidered the wall that has in the past prevented the FBI and the CIA from working effectively together.

The FBI has expanded its terrorist threat warning system. A new five-level homeland security alert system has been created. Ninety-three antiterrorism task forces have been created in U.S. Attorney offices around the country. INS and Customs are working together to increase their cooperation in border enforcement. The FBI now provides information, on a daily basis, to terrorism task forces nationwide as well as to the CIA and the Defense Department. Director Mueller is in the process of revamping the entire FBI so that its primary focus is the prevention of terrorism. The INS and the State Department have together developed a Consolidated Consular Database, a database that includes visa information and photographs for aliens seeking entry into the U.S.

We have created an entire new agency, the Transportation Security Administration. Its sole mission is to protect the Nation's transportation systems. TSA has deployed federal passenger screeners to 122 airports. They have hired more than 32,000 new Federal security screeners. These screeners will be in all 429 commercial airports by November 19. Ultimately, TSA will hire some 54,000 Federal passenger and baggage screener workers. This represents a wholesale change from the way the country organized its airport security systems prior to September 11.

Congress, with the leadership of Senator BYRD, has passed an emergency supplemental spending bill designed to increase the resources available to our States and localities and so the country can better prevent and respond to terror threats.

The President's proposal was developed extremely rapidly, after months of Administration claims that a Homeland Security Department was not necessary, and by a tiny number of people with little to no expertise in security matters. In contrast, the chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee has been at this issue for over a year. Senator LIEBERMAN rightly alerted us to the recommendations of the Hart/Rudman Commission and others even before September 11. His committee held a series of hearings over the past year to determine how best to restructure and reorganize Federal agencies so that they are best positioned to respond to terror.

It is much more important that we do this right rather than doing this quickly. Imagine the impact on our country if we get this massive job wrong. Reorganizations are hard work, and if history is any guide our first effort often needs to be revisited. Modern management principles teach that the agencies and functions of the executive branch should be grouped together based on their major purposes or missions. The National Security Act of 1947 created the Department of Defense, the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Council. Even this well thought out proposal has required serious congressional tinkering: Congress made further amendments to the organization of our national security agencies in 1949, 1953, 1958, and in 1986.

Senator BYRD's amendment builds on the work of the Committee on Governmental Affairs. The amendment retains the overall administrative structure as envisioned by the committee: six new directorates, each headed by an Under Secretary. A new Directorate of Immigration Affairs is created, and recommendations made by Senators KENNEDY and BROWNBACK to reform the INS are adopted there. The new Secretary of Homeland Security is required to submit to Congress recommendations for structuring the other five directorates. The first recommendation would be received by Congress no later than February of next year. Congress is required to take action on all of the administration's proposals by 13 months from after the legislation goes into effect. The Department would be in place in 13 months time at the latest, the same timeframe envisioned by Senator LIEBERMAN's proposal.

The Byrd amendment gives us an orderly process under which agencies are transferred into the new Department. The Governmental Affairs bill requires that agencies are transferred to the new Department over a transition period lasting 13 months. But neither the Byrd Amendment nor the Governmental Affairs Committee's bill guarantees that a new Department will be "up and running" in just over a year's time. In fact, the General Accounting Office has testified that Congress should not expect "meaningful and sustainable results" from the new Department for at least 5 years, and perhaps as long as 10 years, due to the inherently slow nature of transitioning so many agencies into one new structure. Timing of the creating of a new Department is thus not an issue under either proposal.

Senator BYRD's proposal guarantees that the new Department will be created with increased congressional oversight over its functions. Congress will not be able to pass this bill and walk away. Rather, we will be forced to more closely scrutinize these proposals to better ensure that the new Department will function effectively. I urge my colleagues to support the Byrd amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has 4 minutes 19 seconds.

Mr. BYRD. There remain 4 minutes 19 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Chair inform me when I have 1 minute remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Tennessee and others have claimed that my amendment would delay the implementation of the Department.

The exact opposite is true. My amendment will provide in an inordinate way the expeditious functioning and the expeditious transfers of the various agencies in the Department.

Let me say this, too. The people who are going to protect this country under a new Homeland Security Department are protecting this country today. They are on the borders every night. They are at the ports of entry. They are at the airports. We saw only recently the FBI arrest of six persons of Yemeni descent. According to the FBI, they constitute a terrorist cell. So the FBI is out there doing its job. We don't have a Department of Homeland Security. It didn't keep the FBI from doing its work. These people are out there every night and every day, 24 hours a day. So the work is going forward. Even if we never create a Homeland Security Department, these people are out there, and they are performing their work, and doing it admirably.

The argument has been made that Senators should oppose my amendment because it would undo the work of the Governmental Affairs Committee and force the Senate to readdress issues that have already been decided. But the Senate has not decided these issues, and they won't be decided even if we pass the Lieberman bill.

Of the 80-plus Federal agencies that currently have homeland security-related functions, we don't know why 28 of those agencies and offices were chosen by the administration and endorsed by the Governmental Affairs Committee to be transferred to this new Department. We don't know how the administration will reorganize these agencies once they are transferred.

We don't even have a budget for this new Department. So we have no idea about the costs associated with implementing it or how the administration plans to pay for this Department. We don't know if and by how much worker protection will be curtailed within this new Department.

Yet the Lieberman bill would have the Congress grant the statutory powers to the administration to create this Department and require only that the President report back to the Congress and to the American people after these decisions have already been made. The Congress would walk away from this new Department and require only that the President let us know how everything turns out.

My amendment seeks to create a process by which the Congress would retain control over the implementation of the new Department. It seeks to ensure that this Department is not left to languish in a limbo of chaos and confusion.

My amendment seeks to ensure that the Congress thoroughly consider what we are doing before granting broad authority to the administration with regard to such fundamental concerns as civil service protections and the privacy rights and civil liberties of the American public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 3 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I will tell you what is delaying the work of homeland security—the intransigence on the part of the President. He had an opportunity to sign an appropriations bill that would provide $2.5 billion for homeland security—a total of $5.1 billion. He had an opportunity to sign it as an emergency. All it needed was his name. He had 30 days in which to consider it. He steadfastly refused to sign his name. This is money that is awaiting the President's signature to go throughout this country to aid the people at the local level in making preparations to avoid another terrorist attack, and to ameliorate the effects of such attacks if they occur.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for an additional 30 seconds for each side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I urge Senators to cast their vote today. I know most of the other side, if not all on the other side of the aisle, will probably vote against this amendment. We are going to lose on this amendment, but I thank those who have spoken for it. I thank those who will vote for it.

Let me say to you that it is not how it looks today; it is how your vote will look 1 year from today. I urge all Senators to support my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I appreciate this amendment being put forward. I oppose it intensely. I have great respect for the sponsor. But I appreciate it being put forward because, more than any other amendment that we have heard or will hear on this bill, it frames the issue. The question that Senator BYRD's amendment forces every Senator to answer is, Do you want to create a Department of Homeland Security anytime soon? Do you have a feeling of urgency about the disorganization of our Federal Government's response to the terrorist threat, and do you want to respond to it anytime soon?

With all respect, this amendment eviscerates the proposal that came out of our committee, the bipartisan proposal. As I have said earlier in the debate, it builds a house and leaves only the attic with a few people up on top. It creates an army to protect America and the rest of the world against terrorism with a few generals and no soldiers underneath.

To say that it strengthens our proposal is like telling somebody who owns a house that you are strengthening their house by removing the foundation. It puts at issue what we have done.

I do not see how anyone can vote for this amendment and say they are for adopting and creating a Department of Homeland Security soon. The question is, What happens after 13 months? Under our bill, as Senator BYRD has said, all of the agencies that are going to be part of the new Department have to be transferred within 13 months. To me, that means they are going to be operating together as a whole Department, but they have to be transferred.

What happens under the amendment? All that has to happen in 13 months is that Congress has to act in some way, if Congress 13 months from now decides that it wants to act. It is kind of a moral invocation, if you will. It is not enforceable by anyone. That is why I say that ultimately not only does the amendment eviscerate the bill but it has no end point to it.

Senator BYRD is right. There are Border Patrol and other agencies out there right now, but are they talking to each other? Are they coordinating their strategies? Are they integrating their databases? Are they meshing their command structures? Are they working adequately with State and local officials with the purpose of making every decision on every agency stronger and more effective to protect our Nation? The answer is no.

In a Dear Colleague letter that Senator BYRD sent, he said similar things to what he said on the floor. He said that the "amendment seeks to create a process by which the Congress would retain control over the implementation of this new Department." But it does so at a very high cost. The cost is no guarantee that the Department would be created anytime soon.

I stress that the underlying proposal which came out of our committee does, in fact, protect the right of Congress to oversee and have great influence over the implementation of this new Department, first, and most significantly, through the appropriations process, and, second, we specifically rejected a call by the White House for broad authority to reorganize the components of the new Department notwithstanding what the law says now. We have said in this bill that you can only do what the law allows. If you want to change the law, you have to come back to the place where laws are made; that is, the Congress. We have required that every 6 months the new Secretary come back to Congress and make recommendations to us about any changes he or she wants to make in this Department.

So the issue is clear, and the moment of truth has arrived for Senators. Do we want to create a Department of Homeland Security now? If you do, I respectfully suggest that you must vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There appears to be.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR STROM THURMOND

Mr. DASCHLE. Madam President, I join my colleagues today in this special presentation to acknowledge the distinguished Senator from South Carolina for his decades of service in this Senate.

America has changed in many ways in the 48 years since JAMES STROM THURMOND was first elected to the Senate. But some things have not changed. Among them are Senator THURMOND's fierce determination to do what he regards as the right thing for the people of his beloved South Carolina.

While Senator THURMOND and I often reach different conclusions and cast different votes, I admire his devotion to his State, to our Nation, and to this Senate. In recent years, fulfilling that obligation has seemed at times to require an extraordinary exercise of will or love or both.

Someday another Senator will sit in Senator THURMOND's seat, but it is hard to imagine anyone ever filling his shoes. He is, as I have said before, an institution within an institution.

He has been alive for almost half the history of the United States. Theodore Roosevelt was President when he was born. He was 17 years old when American women secured the right to vote. He is one of only a few Americans alive who received votes from Civil War veterans. He has lived through the term of 18 of America's 43 Presidents and served as a Senator under 10 of them.

His long and distinguished career is remarkable for its many successes, both in and out of the Senate.

In 1996, Senator THURMOND became the oldest person ever to serve in the Senate.

In 1997, he became the longest serving Senator.

In 1998, he became one of only three Senators, in addition to our colleague, Senator ROBERT BYRD, ever to cast 15,000 votes in this Senate.

In addition, Senator THURMOND has served as a senator in the South Carolina State Legislature and as Governor of that great State. He has been a senior member of both the Democratic and Republican parties and a Presidential candidate of a third party. There is not another American, living or dead, who can make that claim.

He has also served our country in uniform. Senator THURMOND entered the U.S. Army for the first time in 1924. Twenty years later, he volunteered for service in World War II, and on June 6, 1944, at the age of 43, he took part in the first wave of the D-Day invasion, the airdrop of American troops on Normandy Beach.

I am told that Senator THURMOND wanted to parachute into Normandy Beach, but another officer who clearly did not know with whom he was dealing, decided Senator THURMOND was too old to jump out of an airplane. So Senator THURMOND piloted a glider instead, landing, with the rest of his company, behind enemy lines.

Senator THURMOND is today a retired major general in the Army Reserves, the President pro tempore Emeritus of the Senate, a member of the South Carolina Hall of Fame, and a recipient of more honors and awards than any of us can name, including the prestigious Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Simply said, we will never see another like him.

I join my colleagues this morning in our heartfelt expression of gratitude to Senator THURMOND for his decades of service. We wish him, his family, and staff our very best in his future, whatever life may hold beyond the 107th Congress.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Madam President, today the Senate takes time to celebrate the life and career of one of its most outstanding Members who, though always a loyal son of South Carolina, has become, indeed, a nation's treasure. It is not enough to say Senator STROM THURMOND has lived his life well. It has been an extraordinary life.

Again and again today, we will hear points made about various accomplishments in his life. Senator DASCHLE has already noted many of them, but there is so much that can be said about this particular Senator that words are almost inadequate.

As I was thinking about him over the weekend, I thought about his life and what he has done and what he has seen and the little acts he does on a human personal basis.

First, when one thinks about it, his is a life that has included being an educator, a judge, a soldier, yes, a general, Governor, a Presidential candidate—in fact, when I was 7 years old, Senator THURMOND was already running for President and carried my State as well as four others, I believe—and a U.S. Senator where he has served so admirably as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and President pro tempore.

I remember in my first couple of years in the Senate, Senator THURMOND was managing a bill on the floor. I believe it was a crime bill. I remember he got right out in the center aisle and gave a fantastic speech, with energy, all the enthusiasm one would expect from a much younger man, but then he was young in spirit, and he made us all feel good about what we could do as the years went by.

He has been a philanthropist. He has practiced what he has preached. The record is replete with scholarships and examples of generosity from this Senator, what he has done for others on a financial basis but, more importantly, at times, on a very personal basis, and I will talk about that in a moment.

Obviously, he has achieved the ultimate in life also as a proud father. Watching him with his sons and his daughters is a marvelous experience for all of us.

He truly has achieved the rank of statesman. Some serve their country as teachers, jurists, or as State or local officials, but Senator THURMOND has been all of those and so much more: A counselor to Presidents, a warrior in the cause of freedom, not to mention a humanitarian, a staunch patriot, and a faithful friend. I do not think we will ever see a life in history such as that of Senator STROM THURMOND; he has served his country in so many ways.

His public career spans the days of Franklin Roosevelt and the present President, George W. Bush. Senator THURMOND knew the veterans of the greatest war. He was there. He saw it in real time. He knows the soldiers of our current war on terrorism, and today, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, he works to make sure they have what they need to do the job because he understands the importance of their job in the defense of freedom.

When I was born 60 years ago, Senator THURMOND was already a judge and well on his way toward a governorship and his candidacy for President. Yet here we are today as colleagues in this great institution. I know I am not alone in feeling humbled by his presence.

In the days to come, the newspapers will emphasize his extraordinary political career, but the epic that is STROM THURMOND is far too grand to be summed up as an enduring politician and to leave it at that. No, we know better. After all, it is not many of us who have a room in this Capitol named for us while we are still here to use it.

Another Senator from South Carolina, John C. Calhoun, in his time was described this way:

> As a Senator, he was the model of courtesy. He listened attentively to each one who spoke, neither reading nor writing when in his seat.

At one time or another, I believe every Senator in this Chamber has been touched by Senator THURMOND's courtesy, and we will honor him if we continue to follow his example in that regard. Hardly a day goes by, when Senator THURMOND is on the floor, that he does not call me over and offer support and offer a piece of candy for my beautiful wife. He reassures me what a beautiful lady she is and what a credit she is to this Senator from Mississippi.

I wonder sometime, too, if we all appreciate and even our pages realize that a great man of history walks among us every day, but he does it in such a humble way and such a generous way. How many of us have taken the time to not only acknowledge these pages who are seeing history in the making and are working for us to make the institution look better, but taken the time to bring them to the dining room for a meal?

I always loved it when I was in the dining room and Senator THURMOND came with a whole string of pages right behind him treating them to lunch. It was like a hen with her biddies behind her, a beautiful sight—a little thing, but typical of Senator THURMOND.

There are the calls he has made when friends have had trouble in their family or illnesses or deaths. There are stories of Senator THURMOND calling people or even going to the house of one of his former staff members after she had had a baby. Knocking on the door, he came to congratulate her and to get a look at this newborn baby. Over and over, that is the kind of man he has been.

So while he has had these great achievements, he has kept that common touch. In fact, I think the greatest story about Senator THURMOND is not list of achievements but the fact he has never wavered in defending, protecting, and working for the principles he believes in and the importance of keeping that human touch, that personal touch.

Senator THURMOND is a different case in many ways. He is, of course, of a different generation and he exemplifies its strengths just as he has worked to leave behind its shortcomings. During his last Congress with us, it was sometimes difficult to remember that at the start of World War II, a mere youngster of 39, he actually resigned his office as a judge. He was with the 82nd Airborne Division and landed in the Normandy Invasion on D-day.

Half a century ago, GEN Douglas MacArthur addressed the Congress and delivered his famous line about old soldiers:

> They never die, they just fade away.

Well, Senator THURMOND decided to do neither. He resolved to keep working for his country, devoting all of his experience, all of his wisdom, all of his energy to that task. We have been blessed and enriched by his determination. He has been here every day, and I have not checked the record, but I think he has been here for every vote this year, which is typical of the sheer iron will that has been the example of his great life.

He has seen the defeat of nazism, the collapse of communism, and the bringing down of the Iron Curtain. He has been an important part of making all of that possible. He has worked with Presidents repeatedly to support their efforts to do what needed to be done for our country.

It has been 213 years since George Washington was inaugurated as President and the first Congress assembled to write laws for the new Nation. Senator THURMOND has seen more than 99 of those years. It reemphasizes the fact we are still a young country. This great Republic is still very young in the annals of history, and this one man has seen almost half of those years. He is an institution, a senior statesman, but he is much more than that. He is a patriot. He loves this country of ours in an old-fashioned way, a simple and deep way that seemed to have gone out of style a few decades ago but a way we have relearned during this past year.

Our centennial Senator's life is a part of the rich rolling tapestry that is America's history. This soldier who fought at Normandy, this cold war warrior who helped Presidents overcome communism, has lived to witness a new enemy of freedom strike at us and all that we hold dear. He saw the tragedy last September that still tears at our hearts, but he saw, too, the resurgence of what he cherished most: Pride in America, devotion, honor and sacrifice for America. I do not know of any other Senator who will earn this title, but it seems to be appropriate to refer to Senator THURMOND as our centennial Senator. He could have very easily been an inspiration perhaps for that great quote that is attributed to Teddy Roosevelt back in 1910 that sums up, I believe, the greatness of this Senator.

> It is not the critic who counts, not the man who points out how the strong man stumbles or where the doer of deeds could have done better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood; who strives valiantly; who errs and comes up short again and again, who knows the great enthusiasms, the great devotions, and spends himself in a worthy cause; who at the best, knows, in the end, the triumph of high achievement and who, at the worst, if he fails, at least fails while daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat.

Senator THURMOND has been in the arena. He has been dusty and sweaty and, yes, probably even bloody, but he still stands, the rock from South Carolina, a great Senator, a great man, a great friend. The Senate will not quite be the same when we convene next year, but we will all be better because of the Senator from South Carolina.

Senator THURMOND, you are the best. You are an institution, but more than that you are a great friend. We love you and we wish you many more happy days in your next career.

Mr. THURMOND. Thank you very much.

Mr. LOTT. Madam President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Madam President, the distinguished minority leader has noted STROM's comment about the beauty of his wife Patricia. STROM has also done that to my wife Peatsy. I think the record ought to be made here that for STROM THURMOND, all women are beautiful.

Madam President, as the longest serving junior Senator in the history of the Senate, it is my distinct honor and privilege to pay tribute to the longest serving senior Senator and the longest serving Senator in the history of the Senate. The story is told about a Washington matron at one of these evening receptions, how she rushed up to a Spanish Ambassador and allowed:

> Mr. Ambassador, this bull fighting, the No. 1 sport in your country, I think it is revolting.

After a pause, the Ambassador turned to the matron and said:

> Madam, you are mistaken. Bull fighting is our No. 2 sport; revolting is our No. 1.

That has been the record of J. STROM THURMOND in the field of public service. He has definitely been a revolutionary with respect to public service. At age 29, he served as the youngest county superintendent of education in the history of our State; thereupon, being elected as the youngest State Senator from his home county; thereafter, as the youngest circuit judge presiding, being elevated there in the year 1938.

When Germany declared war, just a few days after December 7—Germany declared war first on us before we declared war on Germany—STROM THURMOND, as a presiding circuit judge, took off those robes and volunteered for service in World War II. He was exempt from service under our judiciary rules in the State of South Carolina, but he didn't hesitate. And as has been noted here, made the invasion on D-day, June 6, 1944, in Europe and served in five campaigns with valor and courage, coming back to retire as a major general in the U.S. Army.

In 1948, he organized the only really successful third party movement in this country as a States Rights Party, and as a candidate for President he carried South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana—he carried four States.

Thereafter, in 1954 he was the first—and I take it the only—Senator ever elected to the Senate as a write-in candidate. Then, in 1964, having been a Democrat, he changed parties. He saw the future of the State of South Carolina and the South in the Republican Party, and he has led the move ever since.

There is no question in my mind that he has had the most distinguished of service up here, serving as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, and the President pro tempore of the Senate. But I think people back home know STROM best of all for his constituent service. Whether it is the job found for a constituent, or helping a family get a relative admitted to the hospital, or sending a letter to the deceased's family, or helping when the soldier is brought back home, or whatever it is, you can count on STROM. I can tell that to you right now. He has made his fame looking out for the people of his home State.

It has been noted that STROM was born when Teddy Roosevelt was President. Elihu Root, who was the Secretary of State for Teddy Roosevelt, once remarked that:

> Politics is the practical art of self government and someone must attend to it if we are going to have self government.

And he made the cogent observation:

> The principal ground for reproach against any American citizen is that he is not a politician. In representative America, every citizen counts.

Heaven knows, STROM THURMOND of South Carolina has counted at every particular turn, during illustrious service of some 70 years. I think he is the living example that the best politics is no politics. It is my privilege to pay tribute to him now. I am sure I am going to have the opportunity many times hereafter as we both move along. But it has been a distinct pleasure to serve as his junior Senator.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I have listened attentively to every word that has been spoken today about this colleague of ours. Those words have been true. I well remember when I first came to the Senate, I remember STROM THURMOND's late wife used to sit in the gallery up here and listen to the debates. She was a beautiful woman. I remember very well the day she passed away. I remember coming to the Senate and seeking out STROM THURMOND, and here he was, sitting in the back row. I walked up to his desk, and he stood, and I said:

> STROM, I'm so sorry to hear about your great misfortune.

And he stood with that stoic way of his and thanked me and sat down.

I also remember when Erma and I lost our grandson Michael. It was 20 years ago. I remember the funeral service, and I remember who was there. I recall who came to share in the greatest sorrow of my life.

Some of my colleagues were there. Howard Baker was there, the majority leader. The then-Governor of my State of West Virginia, Jay Rockefeller, was there. Who else? Who else? No other Senator, with the exception of one—STROM THURMOND. He came.

I have seen him at funeral homes of others who were the relatives of Senators and some who were not relatives of Senators. I have seen STROM THURMOND there.

I shall never forget when STROM met with tragedy in his life not many years ago when he gave up the prized possession, a daughter. I went to South Carolina to be with STROM and to share his sorrow.

Then, just a few days ago, a message came into my office. STROM had called my wife. She had an operation—appendectomy. Who called to express concern for her and to wish her an early recovery? That man—STROM THURMOND.

'Tis the human touch in this world that counts,
The touch of your hand and mine.
Which means far more to the fainting heart
Than shelter and bread and wine.
For shelter is gone when the night is o'er
And bread lasts only a day,
But the touch of the hand and the sound of the voice
Sing on in the soul alway.

STROM THURMOND, in a few more weeks, will be the first sitting United States Senator to become a centenarian.

What an amazing record. What an amazing man. In his 100 years on this Earth, he has been a teacher, a coach, an attorney, a judge, a Governor, a soldier, a college professor, an author, a lawmaker at both the State and Federal levels, a delegate at six Democratic National Conventions and six Republican National Conventions, and a U.S. Senator who has served 47 years in this Chamber and cast more than 15,000 votes.

That is more votes than soldiers that Flaminius lost at the Battle of Lake Trasimeno in the year 217 B.C.

Senator THURMOND was born into the Old South, His hometown of Edgefield was the home of the cane swinging Representative Preston Brooks, who gained a place in history for beating a northern Senator who had insulted his family and his state. Senator THURMOND's grandfather, George Washington Thurmond, was with General Lee at Appomattox when Lee surrendered to Grant. His father, Judge J. William Thurmond was a lieutenant of the legendary South Carolina Senator "Pitchfork" Ben Tillman, whom I used to read about before I came to the arena of politics. A product of the Old South, Senator THURMOND emerged to become an important leader in the New South.

Senator THURMOND's amazing life has spanned twentieth century America. When he was born, the Wright brothers had yet to make their historic, heavier-than-air manned flight. He has lived to see manmade vehicles reaching the outer limits of our universe. What a change in a single lifetime. Perhaps an even greater, more monumental change took place right here in the U.S. Senate. When STROM THURMOND was born, on December 5, 1902, U.S. Senators were not elected by the people of their states, but selected by their state legislatures. The Senate had no permanent office buildings; Senators had no professional staffs. Boy, what a change STROM THURMOND has lived to see here.

Even more amazing is how his life and career have mirrored so much of the history of twentieth century America.

In 1928, STROM THURMOND, a Democrat at the time, was elected to his first political office, superintendent of schools, Edgefield County, South Carolina—when Calvin Coolidge was president. Those were the days of mechanically-sliced bread.

In 1932, he was elected to the State Senate of South Carolina—that was the year Franklin Roosevelt was elected President of the United States.

How well I remember the days when the coal miners of West Virginia marched—over 100,000 strong. John L. Lewis, the leader of that great United Mine Workers Organization, had his picture in every miner's home. STROM THURMOND was there.

It was Roosevelt's Administration that marked the emergence of the Democratic Party as the majority party. I remind my colleagues that Senator THURMOND was a Democrat in those days.

In 1942, STROM THURMOND volunteered for service in World War II—the war that marked the emergence of the United States as a superpower. I might point out that Senator THURMOND could have stayed safely on the sidelines of that conflict. He was beyond draft age and, as a judge, he held a draft-exempted status. Yet he volunteered to put himself in harm's way and heroically served his country.

On June 6, 1944, paratrooper STROM THURMOND took part in the D-Day invasion that began the Allied liberation of Europe from Nazi tyranny and the defeat of worldwide fascism.

In 1946, like so many other World War II veterans, including Richard Nixon and John F. Kennedy, STROM THURMOND returned home to a career in public service. While Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Nixon were elected to Congress that year, Mr. THURMOND was elected governor of his beloved South Carolina.

In 1948, Governor STROM THURMOND ran for president as a States Rights Democrat, carrying 4 states and winning 39 electoral votes. This means that President Harry Truman's great upset victory over Thomas Dewey in the 1948 presidential election included the defeat of STROM THURMOND.

In 1954, STROM THURMOND was elected to the Senate as a write-in candidate. Imagine that. No other Senator was ever elected as a write-in candidate to this body. This made him the first and only person in U.S. history elected to the Senate in this manner. He is the only person ever elected to any major office in the United States in this manner.

In 1957, Senator STROM THURMOND set a record for the longest individual speech ever delivered in the Senate—24 hours and 18 minutes, from August 28 to August 29, 1957.

In 1964, Senator THURMOND switched from the Democratic Party to the Republican Party—our loss, your gain—a move that marked the beginning of the "southern strategy" that has reshaped the Republican Party.

In 1981, when Ronald Reagan became President, Senator THURMOND was chosen as Senate President pro tempore, placing him third in the line of succession to the Presidency. And in the early days in the history of this country, it would have been the Vice President and then STROM THURMOND, because he would then have been second in line of succession to the Presidency.

On March 8, 1996, Senator THURMOND, at the age of 93, 93 years and 94 days—oh, to be 93 years again—93 years and 94 days, became the oldest person ever to serve in the Senate.

On May 25, 1997, he became the longest serving Senator in the history of the Senate, surpassing the record of 41 years and 10 months held by Carl Hayden.

He is a man with whom I have never had a cross word in this Senate—never.

On December 31, 1997, Senator THURMOND's colleague, Senator ERNEST HOLLINGS, became the longest serving junior Member of the Senate, 31 years and 53 days, surpassing the "junior" record of Senator John Stennis.

In 1998, Senator THURMOND became the second Senator ever to cast 15,000 votes.

As I have said, what an amazing life. What an amazing life. What an amazing career. There is none other like it.

But I am pleased and I am proud to point out that throughout it all, Senator THURMOND has always remained a man of his word, a devoted father, and a Senator ready to defend his State, his country, and his values, as a distinguished leader, who is revered in his home State of South Carolina—a State that has built statues in his honor, a State that has named buildings in his honor, a State that has named roads and dams and lakes in his honor.

Foremost, Senator THURMOND has remained a southern gentleman of the first order: charming, polite, optimistic, friendly, courteous, and enduring.

May God bless you, Senator THURMOND. May God bless you always.

This is a man. Whence cometh another?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Madam President, I am sort of humbled to be following my great friend from West Virginia and the statement he has just made.

When I came to the Senate 34 years ago, this true southern gentleman was among the first to make me welcome. I came from a fairly new State. Senator THURMOND had already served for 14 years as a Senator when I joined the Senate. He was generous with his time, helping this young Westerner to become familiar with the traditions of the Senate, sharing his knowledge of procedures, and some of the pitfalls, and emphasizing the importance of maintaining a sense of dignity.

I soon learned that the gracious STROM THURMOND was extending to me friendship, which is part and parcel of this man. His courtly manners and his helpfulness were legendary even then.

Today, all these years after he gave me that first crushing handshake, he remains the dignified, gallant gentleman of whom I became a friend in 1968. He continues to demonstrate the spirit that has given him the courage to beat the odds, overcome obstacles, and deal with some of life's toughest challenges.

As he prepares to leave us, after almost a half century of serving the people of South Carolina and our Nation, I just want to take a few moments to look back on the personal relationship I have had with Senator THURMOND.

While we share a bond of serving in the military during World War II, Senator THURMOND far surpassed any of my experiences. He landed, as people have already said, on D-day in Normandy. He served in both the European and Pacific theaters. And he earned an astounding 18 decorations, including the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star for Valor.

When my first wife Ann died in a plane crash that I survived, STROM's helping hand was there, ready to assist always. The counsel and support he offered were born from the experience of his own tragedy 8 years earlier, when he lost his wife Jean. While he understood the importance of dealing with my grief, he lobbied me to find a new partner in life, as he had done.

When Catherine and I were married, STROM made sure she had a great welcome as the Senate's newest spouse. And when our Lily—now a senior at Stanford, who visited the Senate from time to time when she was a toddler—returns to these halls, she always makes sure to see Uncle STROM. As a matter of fact, there is not a day goes by that STROM does not ask me: How is Lily? And last night, Madam President, Lily, now a senior at Stanford, sent me an e-mail. I would like to read from it. I quote:

> When I think about some of my earliest memories, I always come back to images in my head of entering the big white Capitol to see you and your friends. Because, of course, I didn't know anything about the important roles of the people I knew or the grandness of the Capitol. What I really remember is going to see friends like "Uncle Strom" and running in circles around the patterns of the tiles by the entrance to the floor. I can't think of how many times I saw Strom's familiar face and ran to give him a big hug, hearing his voice calling, "Lily, look how big you've grown," or, "Miss Lily, you're such a pretty girl!" Seeing Uncle Strom was always a highlight of my trips to the Capitol, and once I got to know Julie, being with her also made some long nights of political gatherings much more fun! Julie, like her father, is such a generous, caring, and warm person, and I feel lucky to have gotten to know her, Nancy, and Uncle Strom.

Madam President, Lily had a great many birthday parties here in the Senate. At that time, I was the whip, the assistant leader, and Uncle STROM was always at the top of her guest list, which she prepared herself.

I think we can all testify to STROM's sweet tooth. He never saw a birthday cake or a scoop of ice cream he did not like.

I will leave it to others, who will also pay tribute to STROM today, to tell of his many accomplishments. They will note he has many titles in his 100 years: From teacher to coach to superintendent of education; from second lieutenant to general; from attorney at law to judge; and from Governor to Senator. Those titles were all earned through dedication and hard work, and they are hallmarks of his distinguished career. I respect those titles. But there is one that is more important to me than all the others, and that is the title I used first: Friend. We are all the richer for having STROM THURMOND in our midst. To be able to count him as a friend is the greatest privilege of all.

So I am here today, Senator THURMOND, to say thank you for your dedication, your patriotism, your generosity of spirit, but, most of all, on a very personal basis, for your friendship.

Thank you, STROM.

Thank you, Madam President.

Mr. BOND. Madam President, there are some times even in the Senate when enough words cannot be said. Senator THURMOND has probably made more history than many of us will ever see. He has experienced more history than most of us will ever know. Every member of the Senate would be proud to tell our grandchildren that "I served with STROM THURMOND." Because the senior Senator from South Carolina has been such a force in politics for over 50 years, I would like to tell my grandparents that I served with STROM THURMOND.

He always did his duty and he spent the better part of a century shaping the greatest nation on earth.

There isn't a history teacher alive who wouldn't like to bring their class to Senator THURMOND's office to see a portrait of history laid out on his walls. One would think that to live and perform at the ripe young age of 99, one would be wise to pace oneself. Instead, Senator THURMOND has put in a professional marathon, but at the pace of a 100-yard dash. He is the Lance Armstrong and Cal Ripken of pubic service with over 15,000 votes. Alternatively, I would rather say that Cal Ripken is the iron man STROM THURMOND of Major League Baseball.

In his book, "Great Political Wit," our former colleague Bob Dole described Senator THURMOND's 90th birthday. At that festive event, Senator THURMOND noted that, "all evening, people had been coming up to him to express the hope that they would be present for his 100th birthday. To which Senator THURMOND replied, "if you eat right and exercise regularly, I don't see any reason why you shouldn't be around to see it."

In terms of ethics and duty, he remains old fashioned. He believes that the real "woman's place" is sitting next to him testing his charm, and his grip.

If there is a more extraordinary resume in a Congress full of honor and achievement, I cannot imagine. In his career, he has responded to the titles of: teacher, coach, Lieutenant, Counselor, superintendent Judge, General, Governor, Senator and President Pro Tempe.

When Ted Williams set down his bat to go defend his country during World War II, Judge THURMOND set down his gavel, at age 40, to join the 82nd Airborne that landed on Normandy Beach. Before he returned to the bench he had battled his way across France, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Czechoslovakia, and Germany and finished in the Philippines.

Few in the history of this country have dedicated so much energy on behalf of the country they loved. And through it all, it seemed that the senior Senator had energy in reserve.

I had my staff dig up the Senator's first floor statement which occurred on January 28, 1955. He spoke directly after Senators Long and Humphrey. He was speaking eloquently but directly and succinctly on the need to meet the threat of communism head on. This was in relation to an authorization of force to protect Formosa, requested by President Eisenhower. Let me read his final paragraph: "Our earnest prayer is for peace. If war should come, it would not be the result of any aggressive act on the part of the United States. But war might come as a result of any display of weakness, of disunity, or of hesitation. I shall cast my vote on the side of firmness, for unity and for decision."

As near as I can tell, his approach to and commitment to the security of free people has not deviated since that first floor statement.

We are all grateful for the distinguished tenure of Senator THURMOND; grateful to the people of his State for sending him here, and grateful to his family for sharing him. His retirement is well-deserved and I hope he now has more surplus time to build up his push-ups and pull ups so he can return to fighting shape again.

Additionally, after 36 years in the Senate, some of us are getting tired of calling Chairman HOLLINGS "junior."

It is my high honor and privilege humbly to thank our still young-of-heart STROM and wish him a busy retirement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CORZINE). The Senator from Texas.

Mrs. HUTCHISON. Mr. President, after hearing the remarks of the Senator from Alaska, I have to say I am very sorry that my children, Bailey and Houston, will not have the chance to have birthday parties with STROM THURMOND since he will be leaving this year. I know it was a rich part of Lily Stevens' heritage and probably why she is a student at Stanford today. She had such an upbringing and she learned a lot throughout her early life.

It is a privilege to be able to add to the accolades to Senator STROM THURMOND. So much has been said already today, but it is fitting that the first retiring Senator in this cycle who does get floor tributes be Senator STROM THURMOND. There is no one like him. There never has been, and there never will be.

On December 5, STROM THURMOND will celebrate his 100th birthday. To give you some perspective, STROM THURMOND was born the same year as Thomas Dewey, Charles Lindbergh, and the nation of Cuba, which gained its independence from Spain. STROM was 14 when Lenin overthrew Czar Nicholas in Russia. STROM was 15 when a young, left-handed pitcher named Babe Ruth led the Red Sox to their last World Series victory. STROM was 17 when women earned the right to vote, and now he has served with 24 of the 31 women to ever hold a seat in the Senate.

On November 3, 1954, STROM became the only Senator ever to be elected as a write-in candidate. He is the oldest sitting and the longest serving Senator in U.S. history. I doubt his record will be broken in the near future—maybe never.

During my own tenure in the Senate, a mere 9 years by comparison, I have been touched by STROM THURMOND's presence. South Carolina and Texas hold a rich heritage together. STROM often reminds me that William Barret Travis, a Texas hero who commanded the forces at the Alamo, hailed from STROM's home county in South Carolina.

Another South Carolinian who made his way to the wild west of Texas was Thomas Jefferson Rusk. Thomas Rusk was the first Senator from Texas to hold my seat. He was one of the heroes of the battle of San Jacinto which liberated the Republic of Texas. Senator Rusk's family was living in a rented home in South Carolina when he was born. The home, which belonged to John C. Calhoun, would later become the site of STROM's alma mater, Clemson University.

An even more important connection is our States' contributions to the Nation's Armed Forces. I have been proud to stand side by side with STROM in supporting our men and women in uniform and ensuring that they have every available resource to do the job we ask them to do.

In his almost 50 years in the Senate, STROM THURMOND has accomplished a great deal. But his greatest legacy is his enduring support for those who serve in uniform. I was privileged to work with STROM when he was chairman of the Armed Services Committee. He focused on a host of important issues, such as military health care and quality of life for service members and their families. In 1998, we named the Defense authorization bill the STROM THURMOND Defense authorization bill in recognition of his lifelong commitment to the defense of our Nation.

When the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor, STROM was a 40-year-old circuit judge who would have been forgiven most certainly if he had decided to spend the duration of the war guarding the homefront. Not STROM. Even though he was exempt from the draft, he volunteered for combat and went on to become a highly decorated officer.

At the age of 42, LTC STROM THURMOND became the oldest man to help take the beach of Normandy on D-day. His unpowered glider was shot down behind enemy lines, and he survived by taking shelter in an apple orchard.

Given the casualties on that dreadful day on Normandy's beach, STROM THURMOND probably considered a long and fruitful life to be measured in days, not decades. Soldiers who survived the horrific days at Normandy or Guadalcanal or Iwo Jima often say that every day thereafter is a free day.

Fifty years later, in defiance of every insurance actuary who ever built a calculator, or more aptly a slide rule, STROM THURMOND skipped the 50th anniversary celebration of that brief but memorable flight. I remember because I was here at the 50th anniversary of Normandy. There was a huge celebration of the Members of Congress who had participated in that particular part of our war effort. But, there was one Senator missing from that 50th anniversary at Normandy. It was STROM THURMOND. STROM THURMOND, who was 92 at the time, missed the 50th anniversary because that was the weekend of his son's graduation from high school. Think about it.

STROM has always known what matters. He has always focused on what is important. He continues to do that today.

He continued to serve after the war in the Reserves, rising to the rank of major general. His whole life has been a tradition of service. From World War II to the Governor's mansion and ultimately to the halls of the Senate, he has always made public service his top priority.

In the final scene of the movie "Saving Private Ryan," the movie's namesake returns 50 years after that battle to the grave at Normandy of the captain who gave his life to save Private Ryan. In one of the movie's most touching scenes, Ryan tells the long-dead captain that he has tried to honor his sacrifice by living a good life. That scene captures the essence of what we as a nation owe to those who have fought for our country and our freedom: to honor their sacrifice by trying to lead a good life and by doing everything we can to keep our country free and at peace.

STROM has truly honored his comrades who fell that dreadful day and all those who have worn the uniform since. He has been good, as he has also been great. He has led the Senate to keep our military strong through the generations.

For those of us who have served with STROM in the Senate, he has been the senior Senator from South Carolina during our entire careers, including of course, FRITZ HOLLINGS. FRITZ must be the oldest, longest serving junior Senator in the history of the Senate. That will surely change.

And that change is going to take some getting used to. Having STROM THURMOND gone, will make this a different place for all of us, particularly the Senate pages. STROM THURMOND has always been particularly attentive and sweet to the Senate pages, probably throughout his career. I have seen it time and time again where he has taken the pages for lunch or for ice cream to talk to them so that they can ask him questions. I truly believe if you ever took a poll of the Senate pages, their favorite Senator would always be STROM THURMOND.

He is a legend. He is an institution. More important, STROM THURMOND is the heart and soul of the Senate. We honor him today.

Mr. ALLARD. Mr. President, I rise today to honor my good friend and colleague, STROM THURMOND. I am proud to be his colleague and friend. What a great American. After my election to the Senate, he was there to greet me.

When we think about institutions, we think about established organizations that are dedicated to public-service and advancement of science or culture. Institutions are created not by single people, but rather by the collective group that share ideals and values which are inherent to their cause. But while institutions are defined by the ideas that created them in the first place, it is individuals that truly identify the institution.

Just as John Glenn personifies the achievements of NASA, just as Martin Luther King Jr. embodies the Civil Rights movement, just as Albert Einstein represents the science of physics, the U.S. Senate is symbolized by Senator STROM THURMOND. Today we honor the gentleman who has spent nearly half his life in the Senate, a man who people cannot help but mention whenever the Senate is brought up in conversation.

While his accomplishments in this body merit enough attention, what took place before his foray into national politics is just as noteworthy. From graduation at Clemson University, to becoming a State Senator in South Carolina followed by confirmation as Circuit Judge, Senator THURMOND dedicated his life to public service. After signing an age waiver so that he could parachute onto the beaches of Normandy, STROM continued service in the U.S. Army as a reservist to eventually gain the rank of Major General after 36 years in the military. Somehow he even found time to run for governor of South Carolina and serve for 6 years.

We have ceremonies for men who were veterans in World War II and were involved in the D-Day invasion in France. We have ceremonies for former Governors who are elected and serve their states with distinction. We even hold ceremonies for those fortunate enough to serve in the armed services for 36 years. And today we hold a day of celebration for a man who accomplished not one but all of these feats, and then was elected as a write-in candidate on his way to serving in the U.S. Congress longer than any other human being. Yet many of his past accomplishments are overlooked because of his remarkable service in his nearly 50 years in the Senate. It is a testimony to his nature and the impact he has had on American politics that we sometimes fail to mention the first part of his life.

As we honor STROM THURMOND today, I would like to thank him personally for not only his dedication to serving the people of South Carolina, but also for his leadership in the Senate and for being a friend. It has been a privilege to serve on the Armed Services Committee with Mr. THURMOND, and we all know about his hard work and commitment to our military that he has displayed over the years. Thank you also, Senator THURMOND, for your dedication to this institution that we serve in today, an institution that will bare your mark for years. But more importantly, thank you for your service to the United States; you certainly are a centenarian for the ages.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I have sought recognition to join in paying tribute to Senator STROM THURMOND. Senator THURMOND will celebrate his 100th birthday on December 5 and has the most remarkable record of longevity in the Senate of any Senator in history.

I was disappointed when STROM decided not to run for reelection last year, but I can understand his views on the subject. He has been really a paragon of agility and sturdiness, taking steps two at a time, coming up to the Senate Chamber—until very recently. STROM continues to have a very firm handshake and he continues to have an agile mind and he continues to make all the votes. So that is one of the reasons why I questioned his decision not to run for reelection. I had watched Senator THURMOND over the years, and when I was elected to the Senate in 1980, I looked forward to meeting him. But I did not have to await my arrival in the Senate to have my first contact with Senator THURMOND because one day late in November, I was sitting in my den and the phone rang. There was a deep southern voice: I would like to speak to Senator SPECTER.

I said: This is he.

He said: This is Senator THURMOND.

I said: What a great pleasure to hear from you, Senator THURMOND.

He said: I called to ask if you would be willing to support me for President pro tempore.

I said: Senator, I thought the position of President pro tempore was automatically the senior member of the party in power, and I know that is you, sir.

He said: That is true, but I do not like to take anything for granted.

I said: Senator THURMOND, you may be assured I will support you for President pro tempore. And I did.

I would like another chance to do that. Maybe we will have a chance to support him for President pro tempore after the November elections.

When I joined the Senate, I selected the Judiciary Committee, which is right in line with my own training and interests. Senator THURMOND, of course, was the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Regrettably, when there were efforts to form a quorum, members were usually very late. I made it a point to arrive on time. When I did that the third time in a row—the chairman has to arrive on time—when I did that the third time in a row, Senator THURMOND asked what I was doing there on time. Then he thanked me, congratulated me, and said I might even start a precedent.

In 1982, when there were two Pennsylvanians up for confirmation, Judge Mansman and Judge Caldwell, I was there to present them to the committee. Senator THURMOND was presiding as chairman. He asked them a question. He said to them: If confirmed, do you promise to be courteous? I thought to myself: Why would he ask the question, If you are confirmed, do you promise to be courteous? Not surprisingly, both nominees said yes.

Then Senator THURMOND said: Because the more power a person has, the more courteous a person should be. I have not heard a more profound statement in my 22 years in the Senate. Not that there is a whole lot of competition for profound statements around here.

When Senator THURMOND does not appear at Judiciary Committee hearings, I ask the question. I have had many nominees comment to me after a number of years how they thought that was a very significant question. If any judge is listening now, that is the hallmark of a judge. Judges have a lot of reasons to be out of sort with lawyers who are not prepared, or witnesses who are unresponsive, but there is enormous power in that black robe with a lifetime appointment, and Senator THURMOND had his finger right on it.

There are a lot of vignettes I could tell, but Senator ALLEN has come to the floor, so I will limit myself to a couple more.

When Senator Howard Baker was the majority leader, we used to have all-night sessions, a very stark contrast from now when we hardly have day sessions. One evening we had a finance bill before us. It was 1982. It was 11:45 p.m. The floor was crowded with Senators. Nobody had any appointments left at 11:45 p.m. Senator Baker stood behind that podium and said: Amendments, like mushrooms, grow overnight, so we are going to stay and finish the bill. I have consulted with the chairman—Senator Dole of the Finance Committee—and we worked through the night. There were maybe three, four rollcall votes, a lot of amendments taken, a lot of amendments dropped. We walked out at 6:30 in the morning into the sunshine with a complete complex finance bill.

If we did that tonight, we would finish homeland security by morning. In any event, that is one of the occasions I went down to the restaurant, which was kept open. I made it a point to find Senator THURMOND's table and have a bowl of soup and to hear great stories about Senator THURMOND's career in Washington, DC. He talked about Lyndon Johnson as a Senator, and that young fellow, John Kennedy, who came to the Senate, about the heroes and the legends of the Senate, because he has seen them all.

One story he told, which I thought was especially interesting, was about the inaugural parade on January 20, 1949. Senator THURMOND had run for President and had carried four States and almost threw the election into the House of Representatives. In the parade, after President Truman was elected and Vice President Alben Barkley was elected, STROM came down with his wife riding in an open-top car, probably dressed in a cutaway. I am not sure about that. Maybe I will ask STROM to yield for a question here. When he passed the reviewing stand, he stood up and tipped his hat. Vice President Alben Barkley started to raise his hand and, as STROM told the story, Truman grabbed his hand and pulled it down and said: Don't you wave to that SOB. I might be more explicit but somebody might want to have it stricken from the RECORD as being an inappropriate statement.

One more short story. In a Judiciary Committee hearing on one occasion, STROM did not want to see a quorum reached because he did not want legislation to be passed out of the committee. So he stood right outside the Judiciary Committee door over in 226. He wanted to be right there poised to go into the room in the event there was a quorum so he could obstruct whatever it was he did not want to happen.

Ralph Yarborough, a Senator from Texas, came up and grabbed hold of STROM and tried to pull him into the hearing room. STROM—I do not know exactly what the wrestling maneuver was, but Yarborough ended up on the floor in a STROM THURMOND scissor.

STROM did finally agree to release Senator Yarborough with Yarborough's promise he would not go into the hearing room.

As the story goes, Yarborough went into the hearing room. STROM should never have released him. He probably would still be there if STROM had not been so generous.

Senator THURMOND has been an example in many ways as his political philosophy has advanced. He is a great advocate for African Americans, constituents—the wall of his office ought to be memorialized and left intact. He has so many plaques and commemorative memorabilia.

It has enabled me to tell a story on the stump which has been somewhat useful both from a political and humorous point of view, and that is, when running for reelection, I say: If I am reelected in 2004 when I am next up and decide to run again 6 years later in 2010, and decide to try again 6 years after that in 2016, and run again in 2022, and then run again in 2028, at that point, I will be younger than Senator STROM THURMOND is today.

People are always amazed at the thought of running in 2028. So they think it is not too bad to run in the year 2004 for a fifth term. They are always very much impressed by Senator STROM THURMOND.

So, STROM, I join my colleagues in saluting you for a fabulous career and wish you 100 more years of continued good health.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, three score and 10 years ago our colleague, STROM THURMOND, first won elective office when he was chosen to serve in the South Carolina House of Representatives. He has been figure of influence in—and on behalf of—his home State ever since.

The longest-serving Senator in the history of this body, he will be retiring at the end of this Congress, and today we have the opportunity to recount our own experiences with this American legend.

Senator THURMOND had been in the Senate 26 years when I arrived in 1983, a brand-new member of the Armed Services Committee. He never treated me as the neophyte, just-learning-the-ropes newcomer that I was. From the start, I was his colleague, and he was mine. His long history of work on national defense is based on his love of this country, and his own experiences on the battlefield. Somebody thought he was too old to be a paratrooper for the Normandy Landing. It is part of his extraordinary resume that he got an age exemption, and parachuted in on D-Day.

There is no one quite like him. I have appreciated his friendship from my first day here, and, with my colleagues, will feel a great pang of loss when the new Congress opens in January and he will not take his seat as a Senator from South Carolina.

I think all of us recall those lines from "Hamlet" when we think about our friend and his remarkable life. "He was a man, take him for all in all/I ensure shall not look upon his like again."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to speak for as much time as I may consume. I estimate I will need 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in saluting the senior Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, as he prepares to celebrate his 100th birthday. JAMES STROM THURMOND is not just a man who is loved by the people of South Carolina, who elected him to a remarkable eight terms to the Senate, but he is a man who is respected and admired by this body and institution in which he serves.

Others who have spoken, who are much more senior to me, have recounted his distinguished careers, stories, the elections, the changes in our country over the years, and also the positive changes in Senator THURMOND as he has moved forward with America and the times, in making sure that all Americans have opportunities in education, to compete and succeed in life.

I find it interesting that he was the first person in 1954 to ever be elected to a national office by a write-in vote. The people of South Carolina elected STROM THURMOND to the Senate by a write-in vote. At that time, I was not paying too much attention to politics since I was only 2 years old when he won that election.

There are a lot of stories to tell and a lot of impressions have been made in the short time I have been in the Senate. I knew I had come to a very special place when the first meeting of the Republican Senate caucus was singing happy birthday for Senator THURMOND's 98th birthday, and I was thinking of all the stories of STROM THURMOND, this living legend. That day we also had a very rancorous debate on different positions, the policy chairman, the Senate Republican chair. There were people giving nominating speeches and seconding speeches, and it was tough to choose among friends, but we finally decided who the policy chair was and the Republican Senate chair. There were all of these contests and seconding speeches.

At the end, Leader LOTT said: We have to also elect the Senate President pro tempore and, of course, that is going to be STROM THURMOND. There were no nominating speeches and no seconding speeches. Everyone rose and said "aye."

STROM then stood up, and this was the extent of STROM's speech: Thank you all. You are darn smart people. And that is how STROM was easily elected.

There are so many memories of STROM THURMOND in the Allen family. I remember my mother always talking about dancing with STROM THURMOND. Whenever we bring up the Senate, she says: I danced with STROM THURMOND. She says it every time I bring up the Senate, and this was back in the 1970s. I know there are a lot of ladies' hearts that have fluttered over the years with the wonderful privilege of dancing with STROM THURMOND.

My wife's family, the Brown family, is from South Carolina. Of course, he is revered as a hero in South Carolina, as he is all across the country but especially in South Carolina. Any time any of that family in South Carolina had a wedding, a birthday or a birth, STROM THURMOND was there congratulating them on that wonderful event.

I also have the privilege of being assigned to an office in the Russell building that is in the same hallway as STROM THURMOND. I see STROM as he makes it to every vote. I see him on the elevator as we go to the trolley to get to the Chamber. He is always smiling. He is always cheerful. He is always in a good mood.

This year we all were blessed with those good South Carolina peaches to make sure we are all getting a good healthy diet. I was commenting about the great peaches and I said, most of my staff took those peaches, and STROM said: Well, get that boy another bag of those South Carolina peaches. So our family was able to enjoy those wonderful peaches.

Last year, we had the national D-day memorial in Bedford County, VA, which had the highest per capita loss of life in the D-day invasion. It was a wonderful event. The President was there. The Ambassador from France was there. It was a wonderful ceremony. STROM THURMOND was there. STROM THURMOND was one of those brave soldiers who obviously stormed those beaches and fortunately survived the Normandy invasion on D-day. I will say the President received a slightly bigger cheer, but every single person who was there, those thousands and thousands of people loved seeing STROM THURMOND, a true American hero, in Bedford for that celebration and dedication of the national D-day memorial.

The point is, STROM THURMOND is an inspiration to many of us for many different reasons. While we all aspire to achieve such longevity, we admire STROM THURMOND for a life lived fully and in the advancement of public service. As Senator THURMOND reaches his centenarian status later this year, on behalf of all the good people of Virginia, I offer my best wishes to him, his family, and his constituents.

There will never be another STROM THURMOND. Nevertheless, I hope and pray God will continue to bless America with people who have STROM THURMOND's cheerfulness and devotion, and I surely hope we are blessed with people of his character.

It is great to be a Senator from Virginia, but it is truly an honor to serve with Senator THURMOND. I shall always and forever cherish the memories of your smiling, twinkling eyes which reveal your happy heart. You have been a great soldier, a great Senator, and a great leader. I thank God for blessing us with people of your character.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Is consent required to make my remarks?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed for 7 minutes in my tribute to our retiring Senator, Mr. THURMOND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, what is perhaps more amazing than STROM THURMOND's record length of service in the Senate is how he made it here in the first place.

STROM THURMOND was the first and only American ever elected to the Senate as a write-in candidate. The dizzying prospect of waging a write-in campaign strikes fear into any aspiring or incumbent politician. After all, getting voters to the polls is one thing. Getting voters to go the extra mile and write in a name not listed on the ballot is a wholly different beast.

So once one knows that in 1954, STROM was able to inspire a majority of South Carolina voters to write him into the Senate, and into the history books, it makes perfect sense why he also ended up as our Nation's longest serving Senator.

Today, of course, it is STROM's record-setting tenure that has captivated American political and popular culture. Turn the page of any magazine or the dial of any radio and, eventually, you will find Americans holding up STROM as the benchmark to near-immortality.

For years, Senator THURMOND has attributed his age-defying achievements to "diet, exercise, and an optimistic attitude." Well, I dug a little deeper reading old clips on the advice he has given to friends and colleagues so I could try and piece together a more specific and exhaustive answer.

After sleuthing around a bit, here is the "simple" formula I can pass along: Begin your mornings with 20 minutes of calisthenics, 50 pushups, 10 minutes of weightlifting, and 20 minutes on a exercise bike. Oh, and swim a half mile twice a week; eat half of a banana, four prunes, a handful of grapes, blueberries, peaches, egg whites, a glass of Orange Juice, and a glass of prune juice; inherit good genes; abstain from fried or fatty foods. But eat lots of chicken, fish, and all kinds of seafood; abstain from caffeine; abstain from sugars; abstain from smoking.

But beneath all the rubble surrounding "STROM's Secrets," one ingredient stands out above all others. In an editorial celebrating the Senator's 99th birthday, the Rock Hill Herald revealed STROM's secret to longevity as "his determination to serve South Carolina as long as he's able."

I believe that this sentiment more than the prune juice or the push-ups best explains STROM's record-setting service to South Carolina, from a small-town school superintendent among the peach groves of tiny Edgefield, SC, to almost a half a century in the Senate.

Mr. President, as I said, the year Senator THURMOND came to this body on a write-in—a most astonishing thing because no other Senator in American history has ever been elected to the Senate by a write-in—I was playing Little League baseball in Augusta, GA, across the Savannah River from Senator THURMOND's hometown of Aiken. I confess I was not following politics all that carefully at age 12, but I do remember my parents talking about Senator THURMOND's astonishing accomplishment right across the river in South Carolina, having been elected to the Senate on a write-in ballot.

As I grew older and began to pay attention to Government and politics in America, I began to realize STROM THURMOND was something quite special. When I came to the Senate in 1984, 40 years after my parents telling me about Senator THURMOND winning on a write-in, I knew instantly I was in the presence of a legend, as we all have been who have had the privilege of being a Member of this body at the same time as the senior Senator from South Carolina.

There will literally never be another American like Senator THURMOND. We all know he was too old for World War II, he did not have to go, but at age 42, as Senator ALLEN just made reference to, Senator THURMOND was there on D-day. In fact, he was in one of those gliders the night of D-day. Last year, we had an opportunity to see "Band of Brothers" on HBO about the 101st and its experience from D-day through the end of war. I watched every segment of that. In addition to what I was viewing on the television screen, I thought mostly about our colleague and his harrowing experience of going in the night of D-day on a glider. He did crack up, and as we all know, he was able to walk away and survive the crackup and survive the war and become an American hero.

Not many of us are ever going to be legends, and almost none of us are going to be legends in our own time. The Senator from South Carolina has lived long enough to observe his own legendary status, which is a truly remarkable thing. We will never, ever, see another STROM THURMOND. He is unique in the annals of American history.

I want to say to you, Senator THURMOND, as a son of the South myself, somebody who was born in Alabama and then migrated north to Kentucky—most people think of Kentucky as south, but for us it was north—and having lived in Georgia when you were first elected on a write-in, I want to say to you that you have been an inspiration to me and an inspiration to many of us in the deep South who have been so proud of you and your enormous accomplishments over the years.

I extend my congratulations to Senator THURMOND on his pending birthday, reaching 100 years of age. In fact, I had the Today show on this morning and Willard mentioned you, Senator THURMOND. He is working up to celebrating your 100th birthday in December and, of course, finishing up your term. You have had a truly remarkable career that will never be equaled in this body. My congratulations to you and our best wishes for the future.

So, Senator, today I raise my voice—joining the chorus of so many other voices—to pay my fondest farewell to your tireless and timeless dedication to serving the families of the great Palmetto State.

I yield the floor.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR STROM THURMOND

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I apologize. I was not able to be here this morning when the Senators expressed their words and thoughts about our wonderful colleague, STROM THURMOND, who is retiring from the Senate this year. I wanted to join in the particular tribute in saying to him and the people of South Carolina and the rest of our colleagues something we all feel, regardless of the disagreements we may have had on substantive policy matters, STROM THURMOND is truly an American institution in many ways.

I cannot even begin to imagine the U.S. Senate without this remarkable individual in our presence. For nearly 50 years—almost a quarter of the life of this country—through 10 Presidential administrations, STROM THURMOND has been an institution in the Chamber of the Senate. Eight Senators serving today were not yet born when STROM THURMOND was first elected to the Senate in 1954.

It is not the fact that Senator THURMOND has served the Senate longer than any other Senator in our Nation's history that makes him unique. It has been, in my view, STROM THURMOND's fascinating journey through life that makes him unique. His story is truly a unique American story.

In the course of his nearly 100 years, STROM THURMOND has been a teacher, judge, combat hero, Governor, winner of the Presidential Medal of Freedom, and, of course, a Senator. In more than 20 years of our serving together, I have not always agreed with Senator THURMOND, as I know many of my colleagues have not over the years, but he has always been a true embodiment of the "way of the Senate,"—always thoughtful, always respectful, and always deliberative. In short, he has been a great Senate colleague.

My father, Senator Thomas Dodd, served with Senator THURMOND for 12 years. I have served with him for 20. That is 32 of his almost 50 years. They, too, had their differences, but they had tremendous respect for one another and were very good friends. My family will always think of STROM THURMOND not simply as a friend but as a loyal friend to the Dodd family.

I believe that no matter what your ideology or political persuasion, one cannot look upon the life of STROM THURMOND without concluding that it is in so many ways so remarkable.

What else can you say about a man who, at the age of 42, took a leave of absence as a Circuit Judge in South Carolina to volunteer to parachute behind enemy lines with the 82nd Airborne Division during the Normandy D-Day invasion, for which he was awarded 5 Battle Stars for Bravery in Combat?

What else can you say about a man who has dedicated his entire life to public service, to the service of his country?

While never neglecting to be a stalwart in support of the state and people of his beloved South Carolina, there are literally dozens upon dozens of schools, buildings, parks, and streets in South Carolina named after their senior Senator. Senator STROM THURMOND has never failed to put America first.

He has always treated public service to America as a sacred responsibility. In this respect, STROM THURMOND is a very, very rare breed.

Senator THURMOND was born at the dawn of the 20th century, born to a very different time; to a very different America.

Over the past century, America has grown as a Nation. Over the past century, America has become a more free, a more fair, and a more compassionate nation.

And, over the past century, Senator THURMOND has also grown.

Senator THURMOND once said, "People evolve. They reach a higher truth in life."

STROM THURMOND lived through the entire 20th century, a century which began with two world wars and ended with a triumph of democracy.

It was a century of enormous political and social upheaval, but it was also a century of enormous progress and enlightenment.

STROM THURMOND was not just witness to the entire 20th century, he was a full participant.

His journey mirrored America's journey.

In closing I would just like to tell STROM THURMOND that his lifetime of service to his country, and his nearly 50 years in the United States Senate, is greatly appreciated, and will be sorely missed.

STROM, it is an honor and a privilege working with you, and I will miss you very, very much.

Mr. NICKLES. Madam President, several of our colleagues made some remarks concerning our esteemed friend and colleague, Senator STROM THURMOND. I wish to join them in that effort.

STROM THURMOND, by the end of this year, will complete 48 years in the Senate—eight terms in the Senate. I will be completing four terms, and it is mind-boggling to think someone would complete eight, 48 years in the Senate. He was elected to the Senate in 1954 and has served this body with great distinction and honor during that time.

Prior to that time, he was also Governor of South Carolina. Even before that, he was one of the heroes, in my opinion, who actually helped liberate Europe going into Normandy. He actually parachuted into Normandy behind enemy lines. He earned 18 decorations for his service, including the Purple Heart.

He is an outstanding hero, American, Governor, Senator, serving 48 years in the Senate. He has had a wealth of experience.

I remember my first contact with Senator THURMOND is when he called me to congratulate me upon my election in 1980 and urged me to serve on the Judiciary Committee, which I respectfully declined, but I found it was hard to turn down STROM THURMOND. He has been a very close confidante and friend.

My daughter had the privilege of working for him for a short period of time, and she considers that a highlight in her career as well.

He served both as chairman of the Armed Services Committee and also the Judiciary Committee. He served with distinction and honor. He has brought great pride to the Senate. He is the Senator's Senator, and I join my colleagues in saying that we have the greatest esteem and respect for Senator STROM THURMOND.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, Senator STROM THURMOND achieved more before middle age than many of us achieve in a lifetime. Born in 1902, Senator THURMOND in 1933 was already a State senator in South Carolina. In 1938, he was a State court judge. From 1942 to 1946, he served in World War II, landing on the beach in Normandy on D-day with the 82nd Airborne Division and earning numerous decorations, medals and awards. In 1947, the year he turned 45, he was the Governor of South Carolina. In 1954, when he was elected to the Senate, he already had a full history of serving the public, especially the people of his beloved home State of South Carolina. In the Senate, Senator THURMOND has demonstrated a keen political instinct and achieved a legendary reputation for constituent service. The people of South Carolina know Senator THURMOND will treat them royally—a standard I try to emulate for my own constituents. Senator THURMOND's imprint on the Senate is with this institution forever.

Senator THURMOND is responsible for one of the highlights of my Senate service. In 1980, soon after I was first elected to the Senate, Senator THURMOND was becoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He asked me to join the committee. I explained I wasn't a lawyer, but he explained I didn't need to be. Senator THURMOND promised to get me good staff to help me with the technical points of Judiciary Committee work. He delivered on that promise, and I thoroughly enjoy serving on the Judiciary Committee. I hope to continue serving on that committee as long as I'm a member of the Senate, although of course I won't serve as long as Senator THURMOND. I appreciate Senator THURMOND's support of me as a freshman Senator, and an unknown quantity, by giving me the opportunity to join his committee. I hope I haven't disappointed him.

As a farm State Senator, I seek like-minded Senators to support the survival of family farmers. Senator THURMOND has always supported any efforts to advance this cause. He comes from a largely agricultural State, and he understands how family farmers not only feed the world, but also make up part of the fabric of American life. I'm grateful to have served with Senator THURMOND over the years, and to continue serving with him.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to speak in honor of my good friend—and legend—the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, STROM THURMOND.

From the moment STROM THURMOND set foot in this Chamber in 1954, he has been setting records. He was the only person ever elected to the Senate on a write-in-vote. He set the record for the longest speech on the Senate floor, clocked at an astounding 24 hours and 18 minutes. He is the longest serving Senator in the history of the Senate. As he approaches his 100th birthday, he is also the oldest serving Senator. Many of my colleagues will recall the momentous occasion in September of 1998 when he cast his 15,000th vote in the Senate. With these and so many other accomplishments over the years, he has appropriately been referred to as "an institution within an institution."

In 1902, the year STROM THURMOND was born, life expectancy was 51 years—and today it is 77 years. STROM continues to prove that, by any measure, he is anything but average.

He has seen so much in his life. To provide some context, let me point out that, since his birth, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, Alaska and Hawaii gained statehood, and 11 amendments were added to the Constitution. The technological advancements he has witnessed, from the automobile to the airplane to the Internet, literally span a century of progress. Conveniences we have come to take for granted today were not always part of STROM THURMOND's world. Perhaps this explains why, during Judiciary Committee hearings, he has been heard asking witnesses who were too far away from the microphone to "please speak into the machine."

The story of his remarkable political career truly could fill several volumes. It began with a win in 1928 for the Edgefield County Superintendent of Schools. Eighteen years later, he was Governor of South Carolina. STROM was even a Presidential candidate in 1948, running on the "Dixiecrat" ticket against Democrat Harry Truman.

I must admit, Mr. President, that he has come a long way in his political career, given that he originally came to the Senate as a Democrat. I am happy to say that wisdom came within a few short years when STROM saw the light and joined the Republican Party.

When I first arrived in the Senate in January of 1977, he was my mentor. As my senior on the Judiciary Committee, it was STROM THURMOND who helped me find my way and learn how the committee functioned. He has not only been a respected colleague, but a personal friend, ever since.

During his tenure as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, STROM THURMOND left an indelible mark on the committee and the laws that came through it. He became known and respected for many fine qualities and positions—his devotion to the Constitution, his toughness on crime, his sense of fairness.

He is also famous for his incredible grip. Many of us in this Chamber have experienced STROM THURMOND holding our arm tightly as he explains a viewpoint and asks for our support. I might add that this can be a very effective approach.

STROM is also known to have a kind word or greeting for everyone who comes his way, and for being extremely good to his staff. Despite his power and influence, he has never forgotten the importance of small acts of kindness. For example, whenever he eats in the Senate Dining Room, he grabs two fistfuls of candy. When he returns to the floor of the Senate, he hands the candy out to the Senate Pages. Unfortunately, it is usually melted into a kaleidoscope of sugar by then! I have a feeling that the Pages prefer it when STROM takes them out for ice cream.

STROM THURMOND is truly a legend—someone to whom the people of South Carolina owe an enormous debt of gratitude for all his years of service. Clearly, the people of South Carolina recognize the sacrifices he has made and are grateful for all he has done for them. In fact, you cannot mention the name STROM THURMOND in South Carolina without the audience bursting into spontaneous applause. He truly is an American political icon.

Abraham Lincoln once said that "The better part of one's life consists of friendships." With a friend like STROM THURMOND, this sentiment couldn't be more true. I am a great admirer of STROM THURMOND, and I am proud to call him my friend.

Mr. President, one final note about STROM THURMOND: He is a great patriot. I am grateful for his work with me over the years in support of a constitutional flag amendment. A decorated veteran of World War II who fought at Normandy on D-day, STROM THURMOND loves this country. Let me close by saying that this country loves him, too.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate my dear friend and colleague Senator STROM THURMOND of South Carolina for his 48 years of service to this country.

Senator THURMOND was first elected to the U.S. Senate in 1954, as the first person in U.S. history to be elected to a major office by a write-in ballot. As the longest serving Senator in the Senate, STROM has been a part of a lot of firsts in our Nation's history and he has contributed to every major policy issue facing this country for the last half century. He is a true legend.

STROM has been a respected authority on military issues. He served in World War II, fighting in 5 battles, including the Normandy Invasion, and received 18 decorations, medals, and awards, including the Purple Heart, the Bronze Star for Valor, and the Legion of Merit With Oak Leaf cluster. In 1959, STROM attained the rank of major general. He has been a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee since 1959. His expertise in military issues has been a great benefit to our men and women in uniform.

His love for the state of South Carolina has been a guiding force in his life. He has been a coach, an educator, an attorney, a State senator, a judge, a Governor, and, most importantly, an impeccable leader for the people of South Carolina.

STROM has not only been a remarkable Senator, but an even better American. I know I speak for all my colleagues here in the Senate when I say that he will be missed.

Mr. BUNNING. Mr. President, it is with great pride and honor that I rise today amongst my fellow colleagues to honor one of America's finest citizens, Senator STROM THURMOND of South Carolina.

When I look at STROM's career and all that he has accomplished throughout his life, I often find myself wondering how one man could possibly do so much in just one lifetime. STROM THURMOND truly deserves the title of Renaissance man. He has been a farmer, a teacher, a lawyer, a judge, an author, a Governor, a war veteran, a major general in the U.S. Army Reserves, a State senator, a U.S. Senator, a Democrat, a Dixiecrat, a Republican, a husband and a father.

Since 1954, when he ran and won a seat in the Senate as a write-in candidate, STROM THURMOND has worked tirelessly and selflessly for the people of South Carolina and the citizens of this great Nation, casting more than 15,000 votes in his time in the Senate.

I now ask that my fellow members of the Senate join me in thanking and honoring our good friend and colleague for all that he has done throughout his life and throughout his tenure in the Senate. His brilliance, leadership and unmatched wit will be sorely missed by this legislative body and by the entire Nation. But we will always hold on to the many memories and stories he left behind.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to the senior Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Strom Thurmond. Not only is Senator THURMOND the oldest Member ever to serve in the Senate, and the longest serving member, his entire life has been dedicated to service to his country. At the age of 21, in 1924, Senator THURMOND was commissioned a second lieutenant in the U.S. Army Reserves. At the age of 26, he was serving as the Superintendent of Education in Edgefield County, SC. From there he went on to serve as a State Senator, and then as Circuit Judge of South Carolina, a position he left to serve his country during World War II. For his military service, he earned a total of 18 different medals, decorations, and awards. He served as the Governor of South Carolina, and while serving, he ran for President as the head of the third party States Rights Democrats. He received 39 electoral votes, the third largest ever for an independent party candidate. Then in 1954, he was elected to the Senate as a write-in candidate, the first person ever to be elected to the Senate as a write-in candidate.

Senator THURMOND's career as a member of the Senate has been not only long but distinguished. He served as either chairman or ranking member of the Senate Judiciary Committee for 12 years and he served as either chairman or ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee for 6 years. In fact, he has served on the Armed Services Committee for the last 43 years, where he has been a leader in promoting a strong national defense.

So while we do well to recognize his extraordinary years of service to the Senate, it is worth remembering that Senator THURMOND is the perfect example of a true statesman a man who has dedicated his life to serving his country in any way possible, in all branches of government, in times of war and in times of peace. Senator THURMOND has set an example not only as a great Senator, but as a great citizen of this country, and it is for that reason that we are here to pay tribute, to demonstrate our respect, and to offer our thanks.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am pleased to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the remarkable life of Senator STROM THURMOND of South Carolina.

On December 5, 2002, Senator THURMOND will turn 100 years old, another amazing milestone for an indefatigable public servant. Throughout his historic years of service in the Senate, he has distinguished himself through his energy, his spirited patriotism, and his dedication to excellence. Every Member of this body counts him as a friend and as an inspiration.

Beginning his public service career in 1923 as a teacher and athletic coach, he became the superintendent of education in Edgefield County, SC. He was elected to the State senate at the young age of 31 and later served as a Circuit Judge of South Carolina.

He left the judicial bench in 1942 to fight in World War II where he parachuted into Normandy on D-day with the 82nd Airborne Division. He served in the Civil Affairs section of the First Army headquarters where he was awarded five Battle Stars, the Legion of Merit with Oak Leaf Cluster, a Bronze Star for Valor, the Purple Heart, the Belgian Order of the Crown, and the French Croix de Guerre. Upon his return to South Carolina, he served as Governor before he was elected to the Senate in 1954.

STROM THURMOND's career as a Senator has been distinguished by love of his country and all the possibilities he has envisioned for it. His longevity and strength are a result of his determination to further his ideals, his commitment to personal fitness, and his devotion to serve the people of South Carolina.

Senator THURMOND's influence has been felt throughout the Senate, but it has been particularly noteworthy in his leadership on the Armed Services, Judiciary, and Veterans' Affairs Committees. In recent years, as President Pro Tempore, he set an example for us all with his thoughtful wit, his constancy, and his obvious love for the Senate and its institutions.

Senator THURMOND is a statesman whose retirement from this Chamber will leave the Senate a diminished place. I am pleased to join with my Senate colleagues in acclaiming his lifetime of service to America.

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in congratulating the senior Senator from South Carolina, our esteemed colleague and a legendary public servant, as we honor his service to America and his beloved constituents in South Carolina.

When the 107th Congress adjourns sine die later this year, it will end another chapter in the life and legendary public service of Senator THURMOND. For almost 48 years, STROM THURMOND has been an important person in the life of the Senate. Indeed, December 24, 2002, will mark the 48th anniversary of Senator THURMOND's arrival in the Senate after his election as a write-in candidate, a feat that itself is historic and unprecedented. December 5, 2002, also marks another marvelous milestone, Senator THURMOND's 100th birthday. In considering these truly remarkable events, it is humbling to recall that Senator THURMOND's service in the Senate is longer than the period of time that Hawaii has been a State.

It is even more remarkable to consider Senator THURMOND's accomplishments outside of the Senate: attorney, state legislator, judge, decorated World War II hero and participant in the D-day landing, Governor of South Carolina, husband, and father.

I have had the privilege of serving with Senator THURMOND during the 12 years I have been in the Senate, the last quarter of his remarkable tenure, and we serve together on the Armed Services and Veterans' Affairs Committees. As Chairman Emeritus of both Committees, Senator THURMOND has earned a well-deserved reputation as a determined and powerful advocate for our Nation's men and women in uniform and our veterans. His commitment to improve services, benefits, and quality of life for servicemembers and veterans, and their families, is unwavering.

On a personal note, our former colleague, Senator Bob Dole, Majority Leader DASCHLE, and others have spoken about emulating Senator THURMOND's diet and exercise regimen as a way of enjoying similar longevity. I would like to share with my colleagues one of Senator THURMOND's dietary secrets: he has a fondness for Hawaiian macadamia nuts. I can think of no better testimonial for the health benefits of macadamia nuts then the gentleman from South Carolina!

I thank our leaders for scheduling this time for the Senate to honor the remarkable life and times of a great American patriot and a gentleman of the Senate, Senator STROM THURMOND.

Mrs. CLINTON. Mr. President, I rise today to honor my colleague from South Carolina and to wish him a happy 100th birthday.

For the better part of the 20th century, STROM THURMOND devoted his life to public service—service to the people of South Carolina, service to his country in World War II, and service in the Senate.

He began his career as a teacher and coach. He became superintendent of education in Edgefield County. He landed at Normandy on D-day with the 82nd Airborne Division, and returned home to become Governor of South Carolina.

In 1954, STROM THURMOND became the first Member of the Senate to win election as a write-in candidate. He has spent most of his life giving back to the people and the places that have given him so much in life.

As a U.S. Senator, no one has had a more distinguished career than STROM THURMOND. For more than 48 years, he has been a champion for our veterans. Time and time again, he has fought to strengthen their education and rehabilitation benefits, and to provide them with the best health care and housing.

In the last year, he continued to do more for our military. He filed legislation to ensure that disabled veterans have access to service dogs so that they can lead a more independent life. He has reached across the aisle to end the limit on Junior ROTC programs with our colleague Senator GRAHAM from Florida.

He secured education benefits for our brave men and women serving in Afghanistan in Operation Enduring Freedom. Each effort has brought more honor and dignity to the courageous men and women who give so much of themselves so that we can live in freedom.

Just as he began his career as a teacher in 1923, I know that he was so very proud to support last year's "No Child Left Behind Act." He understands that the best place to open a child's mind and heart to the opportunities that surround him or her is through education.

I want to take this moment to thank Senator THURMOND for supporting New York during this difficult year. In the wake of massive terrorist attacks, Senator THURMOND stood by the people of New York and the people of New York are grateful for his assistance as the city rebuilds.

Today, it gives me great pleasure to honor STROM THURMOND and to express my sincere gratitude and appreciation for all that he has done to improve the lives of the people he represents in South Carolina and every American.

We are honored for his years of service and wish him a very happy birthday.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am honored to join my colleagues in this tribute to Senator THURMOND and his extraordinary record of service to the people of South Carolina and the Nation.

As the longest serving member of the United States Senate in history, the Senator from South Carolina cast his first vote in January 1955—when seven of his current colleagues were not even born. His election in 1954 was an American first. Senator THURMOND was the first person ever elected to a major office as a write-in candidate.

Senator THURMOND came to this body half a century ago as a man of humble origins with a teacher's background and a legal education given to him by his father, and he has never stopped teaching and learning.

In the years since he first came to the Senate, he has cast over 15,000 votes, and he has always stood up for his beliefs with a passionate conviction. Over the years, many of us have often disagreed with him on specific issues, but we have always had great respect for his ability and dedication.

Senator THURMOND has served our country with great dedication in the armed forces as well, from his early days as a Second Lieutenant in the Army Reserve in 1924 to his outstanding service in the 82nd Airborne during World War II. He volunteered for service immediately after the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, and piloted a glider onto the beaches at Normandy in 1944, earning five battle stars and numerous other medals for his courage in combat.

I have had the honor to serve for many years with Senator THURMOND on both the Armed Services Committee and the Judiciary Committee in the Senate, and we often worked together to meet the important challenges facing our Nation.

Two decades ago, as members of the Judiciary Committee, we worked together for a period of several years to reform and improve the federal sentencing system. Our proposal was eventually enacted as the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984.

Prior to the 1984 Act, federal sentencing was famously characterized by Judge Marvin Frankel as a system of "law without order." Judges had unreviewable discretion to sentence defendants to lengthy periods of incarceration—or no incarceration at all. Gross disparities in sentencing were common, even within the same federal courthouse. Too often, those disparities were related to the race or the economic resources of the defendant.

Some thought the answer to that problem was mandatory sentencing laws. But Senator THURMOND and I developed the fairer and more effective approach of sentencing guidelines that is used today.

Senator THURMOND and I came to the issue from different perspectives, but we agreed on the goal of fair sentencing laws. It took several years of debates, but Senator THURMOND and I stood together. Our ideas prevailed, and I am proud to have worked with him on this important reform of the Nation's criminal justice system.

We have worked together on the Armed Services Committee as well. Senator THURMOND has never forgotten the responsibility of the 82nd Airborne to be America's Guard, and to go "All the Way" in protecting the rights of our men and women in uniform and our Nation's veterans.

From the STROM THURMOND Institute at his alma mater, Clemson University to STROM THURMOND High School to Interstate Highway 20, also known as STROM THURMOND Highway, the Senator from South Carolina has been honored by communities in his state and by the American people as well. I know that all of us in the Senate commend him, as he retires this year, for his long and distinguished service to the Senate and the Nation.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, it has been heartwarming to hear the eloquent remarks about the accomplishments and career of our distinguished colleague from South Carolina.

He has been my friend and colleague in the Senate for twenty-four years. It has been a high privilege and honor to work with him and to learn from his example of dedicated service to the citizens of his state.

As this session of the Senate nears an end, it is hard to imagine that it will be Senator THURMOND'S last term as a United States Senator.

Since 1964, he has worked hard to strengthen and protect our country and defend the principles on which it was founded. He can be assured that his has been a successful and remarkable career.

I'm proud to join others today in thanking and commending him for his truly outstanding record of public service.

Mr. FRIST. Mr. President, born nearly a century ago, when Mark Twain was alive and Teddy Roosevelt was still President, STROM THURMOND has led a life of public service unmatched in the modern history of America. He has been a friend to all of the more than 400 Senators with whom he has served. And he will forever be a symbol of what one person can accomplish when they live life to the fullest.

STROM THURMOND has served in the Senate for all but four of my 50 years of age. Though that is a remarkable accomplishment itself, we should not forget what STROM accomplished before coming to the Senate.

He was a teacher, an athletic coach, and a Superintendent of Education. He studied law under his father, Judge J. William Thurmond and became a City Attorney, County Attorney, State Senator, and, eventually, a Circuit Court Judge.

Though exempt from serving in the military, STROM, who had already been an army reservist and a commissioned 2nd Lieutenant by the age of 21, volunteered for active duty on the day we entered WWII. As a member of the 82nd Airborne, he parachuted behind enemy lines on D-Day and helped secure the foothold for the Allies to liberate the European continent.

For his distinguished service, STROM was awarded five Battle Stars and 18 other decorations, including the Legion of Merit with Oak Leaf Cluster, the Purple Heart, the Bronze Star for Valor, the Belgian Order of the Crown and the French Cross of War.

After the war, STROM returned home to South Carolina. He was elected Governor in 1946 and then ran for President of the United States as the States Rights Democratic candidate. Although Harry Truman prevailed, STROM won four states and 39 electoral votes. That tally still stands as the third largest independent electoral vote in U.S. history.

Despite not winning the presidency, STROM was determined to serve in Washington. He ran for the Senate in 1954 and became the only candidate elected to Congress by a write-in vote in American history. STROM has been re-elected eight times since. Clearly the people of South Carolina value principle, character and courage in their leaders.

Though it has been more difficult in recent years for STROM to make it home to South Carolina, that has not stopped South Carolina from coming to him. And it shouldn't. For decades STROM attended every county fair, handled every constituent request, and sent a congratulatory note to every high school graduate, many of whom came to intern in his office.

It has been said that almost 70 percent of South Carolinians have met STROM THURMOND face-to-face.

Over the course of his long and distinguished career, STROM THURMOND has been a witness to history. As a young man, he knew people who had seen Andrew Jackson, and he campaigned for the votes of men who fought in the Civil War. He and Herbert Hoover won their first elective office in the same year, 1928.

But STROM has more than seen history; he has written it. Not only is he the oldest and long-serving Senator, he has served with about one-fifth of the nearly 2,000 people who have been members of the Senate since 1789. And he is nearly one half the age of the United States Constitution itself.

Like the great experiment that is American democracy, STROM THURMOND has certainly faced his trials, both politically and personally. Yet, through it all, he has always held tight to his principles, always upheld his beliefs, and always defended American values at home and abroad.

Today we say thanks to this giant of a man not only for the history he has witnessed and written, but for the service his life will inspire for generations to come. God bless our friend, our colleague, and the Senate's Icon of Time, the senior Senator from South Carolina, STROM THURMOND.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I am proud to join my colleagues today in paying tribute to our friend from

South Carolina, Senator STROM THURMOND, who through his 48 years of distinguished service in this body has given special meaning to the term Senior Senator and left an indelible mark on the history of this great Nation.

Well before Senator STROM THURMOND celebrated his 100th birthday this year, he had become an institution within this institution. To many Americans, that is primarily because of his much-celebrated durability. But to those of us who have the privilege to work with him here in the Capitol, it is as much a measure of his inexhaustible amiability, the graciousness and decency that have come to define STROM's way, and his extraordinary dedication to the people and the country he serves.

Senator THURMOND has been such a fixture here in the Senate, it is easy to forget that he led a remarkable public life long before he came to Washington. He began his career as a farmer, teacher, and athletic coach. He was superintendent of education in his home county. He was town and county attorney. He was State senator in his great State of South Carolina. He was a judge. He served in the Second World War, and was part of the Normandy invasion with the 82nd Airborne. He was Governor of South Carolina. And from that position of leadership he went on to run for President in 1948, before getting elected to the Senate for the first time in 1954.

Since then, Senator THURMOND has had the unique distinction of having been a delegate to six national Democratic Conventions and six national Republic Conventions. And he has found the time to be reelected to the Senate an astounding eight times, serving as an esteemed member of the Senate Armed Services Committee since 1959, and as President pro tempore of the Senate from 1981–86 and 1995–2001.

I have had the honor of serving with Senator THURMOND on the Armed Services Committee for more than a dozen of those years, and it is readily apparent why the people of South Carolina—not to mention his colleagues on both sides of the aisle—hold him in such high regard. Quite simply, every day he is happy to be helping and protecting the security of our country. Here in Washington, he has been a fierce protector of his State interests. And at home he has been a gentle and caring friend to his constituents, always ready to listen and willing to act on their behalf. It is a testament to that friendship and admiration that at least 20 buildings, centers, rooms, and statues in South Carolina have been named after him. And that's not counting all the streets and roads that carry the Thurmond name.

The long list of these accomplishments would take most Americans 300 hundred years to accumulate. Senator THURMOND has gotten them all under his belt in a mere 100. And through it all, Senator THURMOND has grown not only as a public servant and leader, but as a human being. After running for President as a State's rights candidate, he later supported the renewal of the Voting Rights Act and observance of the Martin Luther King, Jr. holiday on behalf of his State. And today, in recognition of all his hard work for all the people of South Carolina, he is beloved throughout his State by constituents of all colors. That transformation sends a powerful message that all of us could become better Americans and better individuals—and that the United States of America, for all its blessings, can always become a better nation.

For all this, we honor Senator THURMOND as a man of iron with a heart of gold, who has lived a love for his country and all that makes it exceptional, and given not just the best of years of life but just about every year of life to make his community and his country a better place. The Senate will just not be the same without him. But today we can and should celebrate the tremendous difference he has made. So we thank him for all your service and sacrifice, and wish you a long and healthy retirement. God knows you have earned it.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. President, I rise today to address homeland security.

No Member of this body can deny that homeland security is of the utmost importance at this time. We all agree that protecting Americans from further deadly terrorist attacks is, without question, our most urgent national priority. President Bush and the American people have called on us to act on his priority.

Americans cannot ignore continuing widespread threats made by terrorist groups throughout the world. Even in Idaho, a State that is more than 2,000 miles from any of the sites of the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, people are mindful of these new dangers that exist. There is a general feeling across the country that no one can consider themselves isolated or immune.

In securing our Nation and protecting the American people, we need an approach that is coordinated, comprehensive, and collaborative; a system that acts at Federal, State, and community levels. We are capable of creating a Department of Homeland Security that protects the United States from terrorist threats while preserving American civil liberties on which our country was founded. It is incumbent upon us to create a dynamic, synchronized, and flexible entity, so that we can, indeed, facilitate the need for homeland security on a national level, while at the same time meeting the challenges posed by ever-changing threats made from many different fronts. We do not know where our next threat will materialize and we should not withhold from the President the ability to analyze and respond aggressively and dynamically as the situation commands.

To be successful in our endeavor for national safety, the interests of the American people must supercede party differences; we must be united as we were last September if we wish to protect the people of the United States. I applaud Senator GRAMM and Senator MILLER for their tireless efforts working toward a bipartisan substitute that truly provides the tools and capabilities needed by those entrusted with defending the people. It is high time that the Senate move forward on this legislation, following the lead of the other body, and respond to the call of the American people.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will support President Bush, allowing him the same flexibility given other presidents in times of war. Our quick and aggressive action regarding Homeland Security is imperative; we must grant the President the power, flexibility, and necessary resources to guide us through this continuing conflict. For as long as terrorism continues to be a worldwide scourge, threats to our national security should be met with the fullest and most aggressive response. I stand with the President in his concerted effort to root out this evil and to bring security to our Nation.

Mr. CORZINE. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the Lieberman amendment establishing a commission to examine and report upon the facts and circumstances relating to the most catastrophic terrorist attack in the history of the United States: the September 11 terrorist attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center. I was a cosponsor of the legislation upon which this amendment is based and am eager for the work of the commission to get underway.

The senseless attacks of September 11, 2001, made it clear to all Americans that the United States was inadequately prepared for the threats posed in a post-cold-war world. Now that the Soviet Union has dissolved and American relations with Russia and China have improved markedly, disparate religiously motivated non-state actors have distinguished themselves as a clear and present danger to international stability and the security of the American homeland. The commission that would be created by this amendment would go a long way in helping the United States identify the causes of the September 11 disaster and inform the U.S. Congress as it embarks upon the difficult process of reorganizing our government to respond to newly recognized threats.

For many families that I have spoken with, the inability of the government to provide a full accounting of the events surrounding the death of their loved ones in the September 11 attacks has added to their grief. They have requested that the government provide them with a thorough explanation of the various factors that led to the untimely deaths of their dear relatives. If the public report released by this commission provides some small measure of comfort to these families, then in my view, it is worthwhile.

But this commission is important for pragmatic as well as emotional reasons. Few people doubt that the terrorist attacks unmasked unfortunate weaknesses in the United States homeland security posture. In the weeks and months following the attacks, the Congress moved swiftly to address some of the most obvious weakenesses. Consequently, there have already been substantial changes in a variety of areas, ranging from the formation of the Transportation Security Administration to necessary adjustments in the way that the Department of Justice responds to new threats. But our work is far from complete.

It would be an unfortunate mistake to believe that the U.S. Congress has already uncovered all of the missteps that allowed the horrific tragedy of September 11, 2001 to take place. A commission, composed of outside experts and government officials, will provide a nuanced analysis of the myriad events related to the most catastrophic attack on the United States in history.

The work of the Intelligence Committee has been entirely professional and profoundly important, but it is insufficient by design. The mistakes and miscuss relating to the September 11 attacks are not limited to intelligence failures alone, but run the gamut from foreign policy decisions regarding the use of American forces and aid after the fall of the Soviet Union to shortcomings in American law enforcement and immigration practices. Ultimately, an effective investigation must not restrict itself simply to the operations of our intelligence-gathering agencies. In fact, an effective analysis should not limit itself to the Federal Government, but must take an incisive look at both the public and private sector and at the State and national level, to generate recommendations that will truly address the specific and often esoteric factors that led to the September 11 attacks.

No committee or commission to date has been given the jurisdiction to take the long view and provide a holistic evaluation of the factors relating to and the issues surrounding the most devastating attack in American history. The commission that would be created by this amendment would provide a level of scrutiny and self-reflection that is urgently needed after an event of the magnitude and the scope of the September 11 disaster.

Just 11 days after Pearl Harbor was bombed in 1941, the U.S. Congress passed legislation creating the Roberts Commission, a commission to determine, in the words of historian Gordon Prange, "whether 'derelictions of duty' or 'errors of judgment' had influenced the Japanese at Pearl Harbor and, if so, who was responsible." The commission then made a series of recommendations designed to improve American security.

The September 11 disaster is no less significant and has no fewer ramifications than the Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor. The President has correctly characterized the international fight against terrorism as a war. As we embarked on World War II, we established a commission to analyze the Pearl Harbor attack. Similarly, as we embark on the war on terrorism, we must establish a commission to analyze the September 11 attacks.

It is essential that Congress know what went wrong so the United States can plan for the future. Weaknesses must be shored up, gaps must be filled, and oversights must be rectified.

Above all, this amendment would represent an important step in realizing the ultimate goal of all Americans, both Democrat and Republican alike: to ensure that an event like September 11 never happens again.

I urge my colleagues to support Senator LIEBERMAN's amendment.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, at the close of the 107th Congress, the Senate will lose a legend, a colleague who has served more than 40 years in the U.S. Senate, cast more than 15,000 votes and achieved the record as the longest-serving Member in this body.

Perhaps most notably, our colleague, on his retirement, will have completed the lengthiest record of public service on behalf of our country. Senator THURMOND has served his community as an educator; the State as State senator, judge, and Governor; and our Nation in World War II in both the European and Pacific theaters, an Army Reservist for 36 years, as a candidate for President and as U.S. Senator. This record of service spans a period of more than 80 years.

Remarks by Senator THURMOND at the time of his swearing-in ceremony for his seventh term in 1997 express succinctly his views and commitment to public service. At the time he said, "there is no more rewarding endeavor than public service, and without question, the more than 40 years I have spent in the U.S. Senate have been among the happiest of my life."

As I review Senator THURMOND's record of service, and reflect on his service in the Senate and to our country, few Americans have had the opportunity to witness and shape history as he has. Senator THURMOND's achievements in the military and on defense matters serve to underscore this point.

Senator THURMOND is a veteran who served in World War II during some of the most difficult combat of the war. He parachuted into Normandy on D-Day with the 82nd Airborne Division, earning 5 battle stars and 18 decorations including the Purple Heart, the Legion of Merit, Belgian Order of the Crown and French Croix de Guerre during his service. Following WWII, Senator THURMOND continued his military career by serving in the Army Reserves for many years. During this period, he attained the rank of major general.

Knowing the face of battle, THURMOND never forgot the importance maintaining a strong defense and especially of taking care of our military personnel. As a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee since 1959, and chairman of the committee for a number of years during the 1990s, Senator THURMOND made certain that the needs of our military were met. He had a special concern for junior enlisted personnel and non-commissioned officers along with the welfare of their families.

This concern was clearly demonstrated by his efforts during Senate consideration of the National Defense Authorization Act of FY 1999. In this Act, a number of provisions were incorporated that significantly improve benefits for military personnel. Were it not for Senator THURMOND's leadership on military personnel issues, our Armed Forces would unquestionably not be receiving the benefits that they should and are entitled to receive. I am pleased that the National Defense Authorization Act for FY 1999 bears his name. It is a fitting tribute to an individual who cared so much for our military personnel.

There is so much that can be said about Senator THURMOND and his many contributions to our country. He was an 82nd Airborne paratrooper with a remarkable service record in World War II, a disabled veteran, an educator, and a distinguished public servant at all levels of government. Unquestionably, Senator THURMOND deserves our respect. It is my hope that younger Americans will have opportunities to learn about Senator THURMOND's career and accomplishments. I have been privileged to serve with Senator THURMOND and thank him for his service.

Mr. HAGEL. Mr. President, I rise to honor South Carolina's senior Senator STROM THURMOND. Senator THURMOND will turn 100 on December 5. Only 126 years before Senator THURMOND's birth, the United States of America gained its independence; 37 years before Senator THURMOND was born, the Civil War ended; and when he was a year old, Wright brothers engineered the first flight from Kitty Hawk. Senator THURMOND made a commitment at an early age to serve the interests and needs of our Nation. His life is full of our country's history, and he has made our country his life.

Since his days as a school teacher and athletic coach in the early 1920's

Senator THURMOND has continued to be a leader and serve the interests of our country well above his own. Senator THURMOND served on active duty with the U.S. Army in World War II. He was a judge at that time, so he was exempt from military service. But Senator THURMOND volunteered, and as a 41-year-old Lt. Colonel, dropped behind enemy lines on D-Day in Normandy with the 82nd Airborne Division. During his 36 years of distinguished military service in the Active and Reserve Army, he was awarded five Battle Stars and 15 decorations, medals and other awards.

Senator THURMOND carried his military experience to the Senate and quickly became a respected leader advocating a strong national defense for America. As a major general in the U.S. Army Reserve and a WWII combat vet, his contributions to the Armed Service Committee since 1959 have provided a strong voice on the needs of our service men and women and a first-hand perspective on the realities of war. Senator THURMOND has also used his experience in law and in the military through his long-standing leadership on the Veterans Affairs and Judiciary Committees.

Senator THURMOND will be missed in the Senate as a friend, a leader, a colleague and for his tremendous contributions to our Nation. He is history in motion. Senator THURMOND was born during the Presidency of another fearless leader, Theodore Roosevelt. President Theodore Roosevelt once said, "We have got but one life here. It pays, no matter what comes after it, to try and do things, to accomplish things in this life and not merely to have a soft and pleasant time." Senator THURMOND's life is an accomplishment of great leadership and selflessness. We are all grateful for his service to our country and I am proud to have served with him.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in paying tribute to Senator STROM THURMOND and honoring him for his unparalleled record of public service to this Nation.

No Senator serving today can appreciate what this body will be like when STROM THURMOND leaves at the end of this year because Senator THURMOND has served longer in this body than any other Senator in history. His 48 years in the United States Senate have spanned the terms of 10 Presidents of the United States, and he keeps pictures of all 10 of those Presidents on the wall in his office.

Senator THURMOND's extraordinary private and public lives span the twentieth century. He began his political career in 1929 as the Superintendent of Education in Edgefield, SC. In 1933, he became a State Senator. In 1946, he was elected Governor of South Carolina. In 1948, while he was still Governor, he ran for President as a State's Right Democrat and received 39 electoral votes, the third best showing by an independent candidate in U.S. history.

Senator THURMOND was elected to the Senate in 1954 as a write-in candidate, the first person ever elected to major office by this method. But true to a campaign pledge he made, he resigned in 1956 to eschew the advantages of incumbency before running successfully for re-election. In 1964, he left the Democratic Party and became a Goldwater Republican, presaging, or perhaps, ushering in, GOP gains in the South. He has served as a delegate to 6 Democratic and nine Republican National Conventions, a distinction I doubt anyone else shares.

When I joined the Army Services Committee in 1979, Senator THURMOND had already served on the Committee for 20 years. His love for and dedication to the United States military goes back even further, though, to his commission as an Army Reserve second lieutenant of infantry in 1924 at the age of 21. He served with distinction in both the European and Pacific Theaters in the Second World War, receiving numerous decorations that include the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Star medal with "V" device, the Army Commendation Medal, the Belgian Order of the Crown, and the French Croix de Guerre. He landed in a glider on Normandy with the 82nd Airborne Division on D-Day, and went on to win 5 battle stars. In 1959, the year that he joined the Senate Armed Service Committee, Senator THURMOND was promoted to major general in the United States Army Reserve.

During Senator THURMOND's tenure on the Armed Services Committee, our Armed Forces have faced challenge after challenge in Western Europe, Vietnam, the Middle East, the Caribbean basin, the Persian Gulf, the Balkans, and Afghanistan. Through it all, Senator THURMOND has persevered in his unwavering support for our men and women in uniform. He steadfast commitment to our national defense has been a rock upon which we could all rely and has helped ensure that our military has always been ready to answer the call whenever and wherever needed.

Senator THURMOND served as Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee in the 104th and 105th Congresses. I had the honor and pleasure to serve as his Ranking Member in 1997 and 1998. I know from personal experience how seriously Senator THURMOND treated his duties as Chairman and how hard he worked to be fair and even-handed with every Member of the Committee. I am sure that I speak for all of our colleagues in saying just how much we appreciate not only the commitment that Senator THURMOND brought to his duties as Chairman, but also his lifelong dedication to the defense of our Nation and to the welfare of the men and women in uniform.

As the Ranking Member of the Armed Services Committee in 1997 and 1998, it was a great personal pleasure for me to work with Senator THURMOND in producing the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1998 and the STROM THURMOND National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1999. When Senator THURMOND leaves our Committee and the Senate at the end of this Congress, we will miss his warmth, his sense of humor, and his tremendous dedication to our national security.

In my 24 years of service with STROM THURMOND, I have never known him to be anything other than unfailingly optimistic, always courteous, and ever-thoughtful of his Senate colleagues and their families. It is a pleasure to join all of my colleagues today in honoring and thanking this remarkable man, my friend, for his lifetime of service to his country.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise today to join my esteemed colleagues in honoring Senator STROM THURMOND and his lifetime of service to South Carolina and our Nation.

A career like that of the senior Senator from South Carolina will almost certainly never be duplicated. Although I am the "senior Senator" from Maryland, my colleague Senator THURMOND was a practicing attorney in Edgefield, SC when I was born in 1933. And by that time, Senator THURMOND already had begun his distinctive career in the public interest.

Born in 1902, Senator THURMOND received his bachelor's degree from Clemson University in 1923 and was a teacher and athletic coach for 6 years while serving in the U.S. Army Reserves. In 1929, he became the Superintendent of Education in Edgefield County, SC and soon thereafter was admitted to the State Bar, studying law under his father, Judge J. William Thurmond. While practicing law, STROM began his political career as a South Carolina State Senator and Circuit Judge. Senator THURMOND took a four-year leave of absence from his judicial duties from 1942 to 1946 in order to serve with the 82nd Airborne Division in World War II. During the War, Senator THURMOND served in the American, European and Pacific Theaters; landed in Normandy on D-Day; and earned eighteen decorations, medals and awards including, the Legion of Merit with Oak Leaf Cluster, Bronze Star for Valor, Purple Heart, Belgian Order of the Crown, and French Croix de Guerre, during his military service.

If STROM's service to our Nation ended in 1946 with his military career, it would have been a remarkable record of achievement. But his contributions to education, the legal profession, and the military make up just the beginning of Senator THURMOND's legacy. From 1947 to 1951, STROM was known as Governor THURMOND, as he led his beloved State of South Carolina. After his 1948 bid for the presidency, STROM returned to the practice of law and, in 1954, launched a successful write-in candidacy for election to the U.S. Senate. Pursuant to a promise made during his write-in campaign, STROM resigned from the Senate in April 1956 to run in the Democratic primary election. STROM was reelected to the Senate in November 1956 and resumed his duties and has been elected to the Senate seven more times by the people of South Carolina.

Reaching the age of 100, as Senator THURMOND will do this December 5, is, alone, a remarkable achievement. The 2000 Census counted just 50,500 Americans 100 or older. And STROM is a clear example for those older Americans, and citizens of all ages, of the remarkable impact one person can have on our Nation. For most of the past 48 years, Senator THURMOND has been a fixture and a legend in the United States Senate. He has held positions of power, including President Pro Tempore, and Committee chairmanships. In the Senate, he has worked with ten Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, Carter, Reagan, George H. W. Bush, Clinton, and George W. Bush. He is the longest serving Member of the Senate, and cast his 15,000th vote in September 1998.

It goes without saying that throughout his time in this distinguished body, and over the course of his lifetime, STROM has seen our Nation change in remarkable ways. His service in this great deliberative body has given the Senate a perspective and continuity unparalleled in our history. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to serve with him over these many years, and to join my colleagues today in paying tribute to a true public servant, Senator STROM THURMOND.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, our colleague STROM THURMOND is retiring soon, and I just wanted to say a few words, on this special day of appreciation, about the gentleman from South Carolina. For that is what he is: the consummate gentleman. There is the public STROM that everyone knows—the legend—then there is the private STROM, a colleague and collaborator I have always found to be eager to help a fellow Senator and accommodate his concerns. I have felt honored to work with him on issues of national defense, foreign policy, and many other matters important to the people of the United States. The people of South Carolina, in particular, can be very proud of this war hero, who landed in Normandy as a member of the 82nd Airborne Division in 1942, who was Governor of South Carolina, and who, in the Senate, distinguished himself as chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the Armed Services Committee.

There are great STROM THURMOND stories—many told by STROM himself, of course. For my part, I like to tell the one about his 90th birthday celebration, held here in Washington. One reporter asked if he could expect to see STROM on his 100th birthday. And Senator THURMOND looked him up and down and said: "Well, you look fit enough to me. If you eat right and drink right, you ought to be around to see me then."

He is an inspiration. As everyone knows, he represents continuity in the United States Senate, being, since 1996, its oldest serving member, and, since 1997, its longest serving member. Those are for the record books. But on a personal level, I can say that the Senate will not be the same without his buoyant spirit. I thank him for helping me in so many ways, and for his invaluable service to our country.

Ms. SNOWE. I rise to join with my colleagues today in honoring a man the "Almanac of American Politics" rightly calls "the most enduring figure in American politics today", the Senior Senator from South Carolina, the senior member of the Senate, and the longest serving senator in United States history, our colleague Senator STROM THURMOND.

I think that any of us who have had the honor of serving in this body have to be in awe of Senator THURMOND's remarkable 48-year tenure. The responsibilities of this job, the demands on one's time and energy, are incredible. That Senator THURMOND has continued to engender the trust, respect, and support of the people of South Carolina through nearly five decades in the Senate and nearly seventy years in elective office is a testament not only to his storied dedication to his constituents, but to his seemingly-inexhaustible passion for service.

Senator THURMOND is quite literally an institution within an institution. If this were baseball, he would be Babe Ruth larger than life, shattering records, and giving 100 percent effort at every at-bat.

Even today, I continue to marvel that I am serving along-side this legislative legend. This is a man who was on the floor of this chamber when I was seven years old, a man who was nominated for President when I was one year old, a man who was elected Governor of South Carolina before I was born. Alive even before the Wright Brothers took flight, he has seen firsthand the greatest single period of societal and technological change in the history of the world. He would have even been old enough at age 15 to read first-hand news accounts of the last time the Boston Red Sox won the World Series. Now that is truly amazing!

When you think about it, Senator STROM THURMOND's political life spanned the great majority of the 20th century, while he has witnessed—during his more than 36,400 days on earth—nearly half of the history of the United States. It is possible he received votes from Confederate war veterans in his bid for the South Carolina legislature in 1933. This is an extraordinary figure on the landscape of our land—a living history class and inseparable from any discussion or dissection of the United States Senate.

Indeed, Senator THURMOND's tenure has charted many changes in our country, the world, and American society. In an inspiration to all of us, Senator THURMOND has never stopped learning, never stopped drawing lessons from experience and from others. He bears the mark that defines great men and women—the integrity and honesty of an open mind.

And there should be no mistake—as if the time Senator THURMOND has devoted to public office is not enough for several lifetimes, he has also served his country in the crucible of war, gaining an exemption from being "over age" so he could don a uniform and ultimately participate in the invasion at Normandy on D-day.

Fittingly, years later, Senator THURMOND would call upon his "trial by fire" experience as Chairman of the Armed Services Committee—and I was proud to call him "Chairman" for much of my time on the Committee. He has always been a champion not only of a strong national defense, but also for the men and women who provide that defense, and we owe him a debt of gratitude that simple words fail to repay.

In short, some people live long, but not fully. Senator THURMOND's life, however, is remarkable not only for its apparent disregard for such trivialities as "time", but also—and more importantly—for its richness.

The great American writer Henry David Thoreau aspired to, in his plain-spoken but powerful words, "live deep and suck all the marrow out of life . . ." Well, Senator STROM THURMOND personifies that dream—making Thoreau's declaration his personal credo, and leaving the rest of us to watch in admiration and wonder.

So today, as we celebrate Senator THURMOND's century of contributions, let us also celebrate the remarkable story of America's journey, for in many ways they are one-in-the-same. STROM, your colleagues wish you all the best—and we thank you for exemplifying what it means to serve in the greatest Democracy the world has ever known.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I rise today to pay respects to a man who has served his country for the past 78 years. In the year 1924, at the age of 21, STROM THURMOND was commissioned a 2nd Lieutenant in the U.S. Army Reserve. Twenty years later, STROM fought valiantly during World War II and amazingly, at the age of 43, he was part of the first wave of American soldiers who landed in Normandy during

For his bravery and outstanding service in combat, STROM THURMOND was awarded 18 service decorations, awards and medals. In addition to his Bronze Star for Valor, he received the Legion of Merit with Oak Leaf Cluster, the Purple Heart. For his merit and heroism during the D-day invasion and subsequent freeing of Belgium and France, he was awarded both the Belgian Order of the Crown and the French Croix de Guerre from the Belgian and French Governments, respectively.

After returning from the war, STROM THURMOND began an unprecedented career in the Senate which has been marked by a dedication to upholding the honor and dignity of the United States Military and America's heroic veterans helping to ensure that every veteran has a voice in the Halls of Congress and the opportunity and protection commensurate with the dignity and honor with which they served.

In 1959, 36 years after he had been commissioned, STROM THURMOND retired from the United States Army Reserves a major general of the U.S. Reserves, ending an amazing career that spanned two wars and countless acts of personal bravery and leadership. In the Senate he has brought his many years of experience to many debates and, for the last 30 years, to the Veterans Affairs Committee where his personal commitment to veterans issues has been heralded by all.

As a veteran, I have great respect for Senator THURMOND's active role on the Veterans Affairs Committee and his contributions to make certain in words and deeds that our veterans and their families receive the best possible care and that the U.S. Government honors the promise it makes to each soldier who wears the uniform of our country.

When STROM THURMOND retires after this year, the Senate will lose a man who has seen the arc of the 20th century with his very eyes. From fighting in some of the greatest battles in world history to bearing witness to the Great Depression and the Great Society, STROM THURMOND has seen decades pass in which America has fought in war and prospered in peace—decades in which America emerged from isolation to lead the world to greater freedom and liberty for all—decades in which American made certain the promises of our forebears and their quest for a more equal society.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. President, like all my colleagues, I rise today to honor the Senior Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, who is also America's Senior Senator.

Some of my earliest memories of working in the Senate with Senator THURMOND were our efforts on balancing the budget and on the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. He was the real father of this Amendment, dating back to his early years in the Senate. And he fought so hard on this issue because he cared so deeply about us leaving our children a legacy of opportunity and economic security.

Senator THURMOND told me he liked being around young people because they challenged him with new ideas and kept him young.

As the ranking member of the Senate Aging Committee, every day I grow to appreciate a little more what Senator THURMOND has spent a lifetime teaching us: the importance of being young at heart.

That positive attitude was evident when, a few years ago, Senator THURMOND told Reuters he was ready to be a back-up space shuttle crew member for Senator John Glenn, saying: "I always believed that if NASA really wanted to study the effects of space travel on an older American, they should have called me."

Senator THURMOND has spent almost a century, not only as a witness to history, but as a shaper of history.

Today may be Strom Thurmond Day, but if the 20th century was the American Century, then it was also the Strom Thurmond Century.

Senator THURMOND was 41 years young, when he climbed into glider number 34 of the 82nd Airborne Division in June 1944 and took part in the Normandy invasion on D-day. Fifty years later, Senator THURMOND showed perspective, when he did not return to Normandy for 50th anniversary commemorations because it was more important to attend his son's graduation.

A few years later he ran for President, against Harry Truman and Tom Dewey, as the nominee of the States' Rights Democratic Party, and won 39 electoral votes.

A few years after that, he became the only Senator in American history to be elected by a write-in vote, demonstrating the devotion of South Carolina voters to STROM THURMOND that has never wavered, as his dedication to them has never wavered.

Lyndon Johnson said the Senate has show horses and work horses. Senator THURMOND has always been a work horse.

The experts tell us that one of the keys to a long, healthy life is being adaptable and being able to renew oneself.

Over the years, Senator THURMOND also has displayed a firm foundation of principles, in his devotion to family, faith, and freedom.

Like all the great persons of history who have had staying power, Senator THURMOND has shown that great balance of having a firm moral foundation and being able to renew himself.

In fact, he is the only Member of this body to have served in the majority as a Democrat, in the minority as a Democrat, in the minority as a Republican, and in the majority as a Republican. That is adaptability.

I would also add, he has always shown unfailing graciousness to colleagues, to constituents, and to all the Senate staff.

I remember our former Senate Republican Leader, Bob Dole, being asked what his health care plan was. He replied: "I'm in favor of the Thurmond plan. I want to do what he does. I used to follow him around and if he ate a banana, I ate a banana."

All of us could not do much better than to follow the example of STROM THURMOND.

In Jack Bass and Marilyn Thompson's biography of Senator THURMOND, they quoted a woman who knew him since boyhood, who said: "He hasn't changed. Everything he's done has been done to the full. There's no halfway doings about STROM."

Today we honor our colleague, friend, and mentor, for a full career of accomplishment, for his full dedication to America and South Carolina, and for a full life, in every respect.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I join my colleagues today in recognizing the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and his years of service in the U.S. Senate.

STROM THURMOND has lived almost one century—his 100th birthday will be December 5th—and he has been a Senator for almost half of that time. He is now finishing his eighth full term, making him the longest serving Senator and the oldest Member of Congress. But Senator THURMOND is known—and will long be remembered—for much more than his longevity.

He has had a remarkable life and career of service to South Carolina and the United States, having served as a school superintendent, State Senator, judge, and as the Palmetto State's Governor.

He entered the Nation's military when he was 21 years old and almost 20 years later volunteered to serve in World War II. He was among the brave American troops who landed in Normandy on D-day with the 82nd Airborne Division, and he received numerous awards for his military service including the Bronze Star for Valor and a Purple Heart.

Senator THURMOND has fought no less fiercely in the political arena. He has used his gifts, experience, the power and respect he has earned and knowledge of Senate rules and procedures to advocate on behalf of his causes.

Although he has switched political parties during his career, serving first as a Democrat, running for President as a "States Rights" third-party candidate in 1948, and becoming a Republican in 1964, he has consistently adhered to his political ideology.

I am glad that we have an opportunity to acknowledge his contributions and to reflect on the considerable impact he has had on this body, his party, and the Nation.

Senator THURMOND is a living monument but just to make sure his service is recognized, the people of South Carolina, whom he has represented for so long, have honored him by erecting a monument for him and naming dozens of facilities for him.

Senator THURMOND will certainly be missed around here. I bid him farewell and extend my best wishes to him and his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:30 having arrived and passed, the Senate will now stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent morning business be extended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from South Carolina.

THANKING THE SENATE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am surely honored by the generous remarks of my colleagues, Senator DASCHLE, Senator LOTT, Senator HOLLINGS, Senator BYRD, Senator STEVENS, Senator HUTCHISON, Senator ALLARD, Senator SPECTER, Senator ALLEN, Senator McCONNELL, and all others.

It is hard for me to believe that it was about 80 years ago that I began my professional career. Beginning as a school teacher and coach, I have enjoyed public service as a County Superintendent of Education, attorney, State Senator, State Circuit Judge, military officer, Governor, and Senator. While I have enjoyed each and every job I have held over the years, there is no job I have treasured more than serving as a U.S. Senator. I am proud to be a member of this remarkable legislative body and have been blessed to observe nearly a half-century of our Nation's history from within this chamber. I still recall the cold Christmas Eve, December 24, 1954, when I was sworn in by then Vice-President Richard Nixon, with my late wife, Jean, by my side.

I came to Washington with one priority—to serve this Nation and my fellow South Carolinians with integrity and to the best of my ability. As I now enter the final days of my Senate career, with nearly 48 years of Senate service, I trust I have accomplished that objective.

The U.S. Senate is a special institution in many respects. The six-year term assures that there is the stability within this chamber which allows the Senate to be a deliberative body. The great history of this body reflects the great issues of American History. Here we have debated fundamental questions regarding the status of our Union, national territorial expansion, matters of war and peace, social and economic policies affecting every individual, and many other important matters of national interest as well as local issues.

Given the esteemed stature of this legislative body, it was with no small amount of humility that I moved from South Carolina to Washington so many years ago. Like every other man and woman who serves in the Senate, regardless of party affiliation or ideology, I desired to perform my duties with honor, to the best of my ability, and with a goal of making a difference in the lives of my fellow citizens.

As Senators, we have many roles to perform in the discharge of our duties. There is no other job in the world that allows us to have a more direct impact on improving the lives of individuals and strengthening our Nation. Through legislation, oversight, and old-fashioned constituent service, each of us is able to help the citizens of our respective States, as well as build a Nation which is stronger and better for all who live here. The work we do here benefits millions of Americans. One cannot help but take great satisfaction and pride in such important service.

As legislators we are called upon to vote on matters of local concern and national interest. I have cast over 16,300 rollcall votes as a U.S. Senator. Each vote is cast considering the concerns of my constituents and what is right for our Nation. While I have missed a few votes, I am pleased that I have been present for over 95 percent of all rollcall votes called by the Senate during my time in office.

It is the floor debate and the rollcall votes that citizens most closely associate with the work of the U.S. Senate. When visitors come to the Capitol, the overwhelming majority of them visit the Senate and House Galleries to watch their Congress in action. I suspect that most Americans are less familiar with the Committee system, but as we all know, that is where a significant amount of the work of this institution is accomplished.

During my Senate career, I have been privileged to serve on a number of Committees in the U.S. Senate. As a member and Chairman of the Armed Services Committee I worked hard to help build the finest military force that history has seen. On the Judiciary Committee, which I also chaired, my priorities were to safeguard the Constitution, keep the judicial branch independent and staffed with well qualified men and women, and enact sound policies to help make our communities safe. As a founding member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee I have always fought to ensure that the men and women of our Armed Forces receive the health care and benefits they deserve. On each of the Committees I served, I associated with Senators who were expert in their areas of oversight, who took their duties as Committee Members seriously, and who were exceptional legislators.

One of the primary duties of a Senator is to represent and assist constituents. I consider constituent service to be the most significant aspect of my Senate career. I am pleased that my Senate office has helped hundreds of thousands of South Carolinians interact with a government bureaucracy that can sometimes be confusing, unyielding, and intimidating.

As the calendar draws closer to the day that I walk out of the door of Room 217 of the Russell Senate Office Building, I know that pundits and historians will examine my career and study my service and achievements. I pray that such an examination will determine that I was a man who rendered a worthy service to the Nation and to my State. I hope I am known, above all, as a man who tried to help others. I also acknowledge that whatever I have been able to achieve, through my years of Senate service, it was largely through working closely with my colleagues.

No single individual can accomplish what has to be done here without recognizing the contribution of those who served before we arrived. When I think of the South Carolinians who occupied this seat before me, I am humbled. To follow in the footsteps of such distinguished men as Pierce Butler, Charles Pinckney, Thomas Sumter, John C. Calhoun, Benjamin Tillman and many others, is indeed an honor.

Likewise, much of our own success is due to the colleagues with whom we serve. This is perhaps the greatest aspect of being a Senator—to associate with such fine individuals. I have been so fortunate that in my tenure here I have had the distinction of serving with so many fine men and women. I regret that it is simply impossible to identify each and every single Senator with whom I have had the pleasure of serving. As an historical note, 1,864 men and women have served as U.S. Senators. I have had the privilege to serve with 410 of these great men and women. I have had the distinct opportunity to serve, in some instances, with more than one generation from some great families. I note there are Senators serving today whose fathers were my colleagues some years ago. I am hesitant to recognize individual colleagues, for I have enjoyed my association with every Senator, but a few stand out in my mind.

My long-time colleague, Senator HOLLINGS, has served with me for nearly 36 years. I greatly appreciate his friendship and extend my best wishes to him and his lovely wife, Peatsy.

Having served on both sides of the aisle, and having presided over the Senate as President pro tempore for a number of years, I am privileged to have friends in both parties. I enjoyed my association with distinguished Senators such as Richard Russell and Herman Talmadge. Bobby Kennedy was a special Senator, whose office was across the hall from mine. I have enjoyed a long and warmhearted association with ROBERT BYRD and TED STEVENS. Similarly, I have a great respect for JOE BIDEN, with whom I serve on the Judiciary Committee. My neighbor, JESSE HELMS, is a great American and a great friend. Our current Republican leader, TRENT LOTT, always has a kind word and a friendly greeting. I admire the many genuine heroes who have served in the Senate—men like DAN INOUYE.

In addition, much of the success of individual Senators and of the Senate is due to the leadership of the Senate. Distinguished statesmen like Mike Mansfield, Everett Dirksen, Hugh Scott, Howard Baker, Bob Dole, were great men who served this institution with dedication and concern for the well-being of the Senate and the Nation.

As a Senator I have served with ten Presidents, from Dwight D. Eisenhower to our current capable and dedicated leader, George W. Bush. Three of those—John Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson, and Richard Nixon—were Senate colleagues. In the Supreme Court, 108 Justices have served since the formation of the Court in 1790. I am proud to have participated in the advice and consent in the confirmation of 20 of these outstanding men and women, as well as hundreds of judges in the lower courts.

Mr. President, today's Senate is much different than when I first arrived. At that time there were four fewer Senators, for neither Alaska nor Hawaii had been admitted to the Union. Our friends from the "Aloha" and "Last Frontier" states did not join us until 1959.

Not only were there fewer Senators, but the Senate support staff was much smaller. When I began my Senate service, I was assisted by just four attorneys and three typists. Today, I have over 35 hard-working, dedicated staff members. At the end of my first term there were about 6000 staff serving Members and Committees in the House and Senate. Today there are over 18,000 staff in personal and committee offices. An additional 13,000 staff support the Congress in various Congressional support agencies.

This growth in the Senate staff, as well as the increase in the length of the Senate calendar, is a reflection of the growth of the Federal government. Both in size and in scope, the Federal government has enlarged its involvement in the life of Americans. I am not convinced, however, that this has always been in the best interest of our Nation.

There have been significant physical changes to the Capitol complex. When I first arrived in Washington, the Russell Senate Office Building housed all Senators, staff, committees, and other support personnel and functions. In 1958 the Dirksen Office Building was completed, and in 1982 the Hart Office Building was finished. The Capitol building itself was enlarged during my tenure with the east front extension. That extension provided additional rooms when it was completed in 1962. As I depart, a great addition is underway with the construction of the Capitol Visitor Center. I am proud of my contribution to this effort which began in earnest just a few years ago as I served as President pro tempore and Co-Chairman of the Capitol Preservation Commission.

Despite all the changes that have occurred in this institution and in our Nation, there is one constant—that has been the closeness of the Senate family. There are literally thousands of people who work quietly, outside the spotlight, to ensure this institution runs smoothly. I express my appreciation to all in the Senate who contribute to the success of every Senator and make this institution a community. This family includes the Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the staff of those Officers, the Clerks, Doorkeepers, Capitol Hill Police, the staff of the Senate restaurants, the Attending Physician and staff, the cloakroom staff, the Chaplain's office, the Parliamentarian, the Architect of the Capitol and staff, the Librarians, staff of the Congressional Research Service and the General Accounting Office, and many others, too numerous to mention.

I must also pay tribute to my own staff. A strong, competent, and capable staff is absolutely necessary to any Senator. We could not keep up with all our duties, maintain contacts with constituents, or accomplish our legislative goals without our staff. Throughout my career, I have made it a point to hire the best people I could to work in my personal office and on my committees. I have enjoyed my association with literally hundreds of bright, talented and hard-working individuals. I have enjoyed watching them mature in their personal lives and grow in their professional careers. I am proud of my staff. I ask unanimous consent that a list of my current staff be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. THURMOND. Finally, I express my deepest appreciation to my entire family for their love and support, especially my children. Strom, Julie, Paul, and my beloved daughter, the late Nancy Moore, have been the joy of my life. I thank them for their sacrifices and devotion.

Mr. President, no matter which side of the aisle we occupy, regardless of the issues that may divide us, and despite any political differences we may have, all of us ran for office and fought to stay here because we want to serve and make a difference. There is no more noble calling than public service, and no more rewarding place to serve than the U.S. Senate. This is truly one of the most unique and special institutions in the world and the opportunity to serve in this body is a rare privilege and one which I think all of us value equally.

In my public service career, I have served in many different capacities and at every level of government, but none has been more meaningful or gratifying than the time I have spent as the Senator from South Carolina.

When I graduated from Clemson College in 1923, my father gave me a paper entitled "Advice" which I have always proudly displayed in my Senate office and after which I have always tried to pattern my life. The advice which my father gave me, and which I pass on to others follows:

Remember your God;

Take good care of your body and tax your nervous system as little as possible;

Obey the laws of the land;

Be strictly honest;

Associate with only the best people, morally and intellectually;

Think 3 times before you act once, and if you are in doubt, don't act at all;

Be prompt on your job to the minute;

Read at every spare chance and think over and try to remember what you have read;

Do not forget that "skill and integrity" are the keys to success.

Mr. President, I leave you, and my friends, with my father's universal advice and add the following: Always respect and appreciate your tenure in the world's greatest deliberative body; do your absolute best to serve this Nation with honor and decorum; and strive to keep the U.S. Senate the proud, historic and distinguished body of government it has been since the birth of this blessed Nation.

As I close out my public service career, I again thank my constituents, my colleagues, my staff and my family. May God bless each of you, the U.S. Senate, and God bless the United States of America.

I love all of you, and especially your wives.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:30 having arrived, the Senate stands in recess until the hour of 2 p.m.

Thereupon, at 12:43 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2 p.m. and reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. REID).

HOMELAND SECURITY ACT OF 2002—Resumed

AMENDMENT NO. 4694

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 7½ minutes.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I am pleased to urge adoption of the amendment offered by Senator MCCAIN and ask that the vote be taken by the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator asking for the yeas and nays on the amendment?

Mr. LIEBERMAN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to discuss briefly my vote on the September 11 Commission. I joined in the amendment proposed by my good friends from Connecticut and Arizona because it is the right thing to do. Sitting as I do on both the Judiciary and Intelligence Committees, it has become clear to me over the past year that many different causes contributed to the horrific terrorist attacks on September 11. I have become convinced that we need to take a hard look at how this tragedy happened in order to better understand how we might avoid a similar tragedy in the future. Hindsight is, indeed, 20-20, and we may be able to profit from a detached and objective analysis of mistakes that may have been made in the days and months before that attack. We need to learn from our mistakes. The stakes are simply too high to bury them.

While I believe that a September 11 Commission should be appointed, I also think that the administration should have some voice in its makeup. The amendment establishes a 10-member commission with all of the 10 members appointed by the majority and minority leaders of Congress. It is fitting that Congress play a large role in defining the membership of this Commission, but it is striking to me that the administration has no voice at all. Just as this Commission was approved by strong bipartisan support, so too should its task be apolitical. In this spirit, I would call upon my colleagues to think seriously about providing the administration with some role in defining the Commission.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, as a member of the Select Committee on Intelligence, I have had reservations about creating an outside commission to investigate 9/11 as called for in this amendment. My reservations have essentially been twofold: First, the Intelligence Committees were given the responsibility to look into this very matter, so an additional investigation would be duplicative and place additional stress on our intelligence community at a time when its resources should be dedicated to fighting the war on terrorism.

Second, we had every reason to believe that the joint committee investigation would do its job—that is, find out what went wrong, why it went wrong, and how we can reform the intelligence community to try to prevent future such failures.

Sadly, it appears that the joint committee will fall short of that goal. In the Intelligence Committee, I have expressed serious reservations about the direction of the investigation, including the allocation of time and resources to holding premature open hearings.

Last week, the joint committee held public hearings in spite of not having completed its investigation. In fact, what was presented last week was only a staff document, not a consensus product of the committee. Members had no practical input into this interim report.

The interim statement from the joint inquiry staff provided information about what has been done to date, a chronology of events leading to the September 11th attacks, and some background information about al-Qaida. This history may be useful, but it does not address the questions that are fundamental to this investigation.

In the committee, we heard from more than one witness that at least some of the problems in the intelligence community stem from a bureaucratically and politically-induced culture of risk aversion and/or an inadequate allocation and improper prioritization of resources. Yet, it is not evident that the joint committee inquiry is serious about pursuing these fundamental questions.

For these and other reasons, it will be difficult for me to concur in the final joint committee product without reservations. We will not know what we haven't been told. Therefore, we will not be able to vouch unequivocally for the final product.

And, of course, these are the very questions that have led to calls for the creation of a national commission to investigate these matters, and, hence, to this amendment. Reluctantly, I have come to the conclusion that it is necessary. If its work starts after the Joint Intelligence Committee investigation has concluded, there should be no duplication or additional stress on the entities required to cooperate in the investigation.

Mr. President, because of the inadequate course being taken by the Joint Intelligence Committee investigation, and because the imposition of that investigation on our intelligence apparatus will be ended by the time this commission begins its work, I will support the creation of the commission.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I have had the chance to speak about the urgent necessity of this independent commission to review the causes of the tragic events of September 11. It responds to the public interest by creating the best possible Department of Homeland Security to close the gaps that existed prior to that. The joint intelligence committees have done excellent work that led to disclosures that cry out to us for further investigation by our intelligence apparatus—and some other aspects of our Government that created the vulnerabilities which enabled the terrorists to strike at us last September 11.

There is very little time available.

I yield 2½ minutes to my colleague from Pennsylvania and 2½ to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Connecticut for yielding time.

Immediately after 9/11, I opposed the creation of an independent commission because at that time I believed the appropriate investigation should be conducted by the Intelligence Committees of the two Houses and that there ought to be a period for the intelligence community to regroup after 9/11.

As matters have eventuated, it has not been possible for the joint investigation by the Senate and House Intelligence Committees to be completed. We are now nearing the interim term, and that is why I now believe an independent commission would be the thing to do.

When the so-called leak occurred and the Intelligence Committees invited the FBI to conduct an investigation, I thought that was very inadvisable, and by a letter dated June 24, I wrote to the chairmen and vice chairmen of the committees of both Houses saying in effect that it was unwise to have the Intelligence Committees investigating the FBI when the FBI was investigating the Intelligence Committees; that as a matter of separation of powers, it is highly undesirable to have the executive branch investigating congressional oversight; but if they believed it was necessary, a better approach would be to hire independent counsel, as the Judiciary Committee did when a leak occurred during the confirmation hearings of Justice Thomas.

But it is evident at this point that the Intelligence Committees are not going to finish the job, that there are very vital issues to be determined as to the lapse on 9/11, and that on the basis of the current record, had the dots been connected, there is a veritable blueprint where 9/11 might have been prevented and the best approach now is to work through the commission.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter be printed in the RECORD, and I thank my colleague from Connecticut and yield the floor.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, June 24, 2002.

Senator BOB GRAHAM,
Chairman,
Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.
Senator RICHARD C. SHELBY,
Vice-Chairman,
Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.
Congressman PORTER J. GOSS,
Chairman,
Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.
Congresswoman NANCY PELOSI,
Vice-Chairwoman,
Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

DEAR BOB, PORTER, RICHARD, AND NANCY. I have noted the press reports of Friday, June 21, 2002, that the two Congressional Intelligence Committees had asked Attorney General John Ashcroft to see if congressional sources were improperly releasing classified information. That article said: "Asked if lawmakers would be open to interviews and polygraph tests conducted by the bureau, Mr. Goss said, 'We will cooperate with the FBI in every way possible'."

For two important reasons, I urge you not to proceed in that manner; but instead to pursue a congressional inquiry, perhaps with outside counsel or through the House and Senate Ethics Committees.

My concerns are:

(1) I believe it is inappropriate and unwise to have the FBI investigate the Intelligence Committees when the Intelligence Committees are investigating the FBI. That approach raises the inevitable question as to whether there would be reciprocal pulling of punches to avoid a tough inquiry by the other investigators; and

(2) I believe it is undesirable and unwise from a "separation of powers" consideration to invite the Executive Branch to investigate the Legislative Branch. If there is a prima facie showing of wrongdoing by a member of the Senate or House, then the Department of Justice has the established authority to investigate; but this situation would invite a widespread, open-ended questioning of everybody who had access to the so-called leaked information. In such an inquiry, it might be very difficult for members to decline to be polygraphed; and if members agreed to be polygraphed, that would set a dangerous precedent for the future when the Executive Branch might seek retribution from or pressure on a member.

During the 104th Congress when I chaired the Intelligence Committee, the Committee conducted internal inquiries where concerns arose over improper disclosures of classified material. If such an internal inquiry is deemed insufficient, your Committees could proceed to hire outside independent counsel, as the Judiciary Committee did on leaks in the confirmation hearings of Justice Clarence Thomas where Judiciary Committee members were then questioned, or you could ask the House and Senate Ethics Committees to investigate.

I know Committee members face a difficult and touchy situation in this matter but I suggest you reconsider an investigation by the FBI with the attendant potential for polygraph tests.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLELAND). The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, 3 months ago I would not have been on the floor supporting the establishment of a commission to look into our Government's failure to detect and prevent the attacks on September 11.

Three months ago I believed very strongly that the Intelligence Committees of the House and Senate were not only capable of examining our Government's failures and vulnerabilities but were obligated to do so.

I believed then that if we dedicated the necessary time and resources, we would be able to conduct a thorough and comprehensive inquiry. And I think we have made a lot of progress.

Now that we are rapidly approaching the end of the year and the end of this Congress, I am increasingly concerned that the joint effort of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees will not be able to complete such an inquiry.

Our scope is not broad enough. It is confined to the intelligence aspects—not to FAA, and not to immigration and other aspects.

We now know that our inability to detect and prevent the September 11 attacks was not only an intelligence failure of unprecedented magnitude, it was a failure of our entire Government to protect and defend the American people.

I am now convinced that an accounting on behalf of the victims, the families left behind, and the American people must include a comprehensive examination of how every relevant agency of our Government performed or failed to perform prior to the attacks.

The House and Senate Intelligence Committees have been at work for approximately 6 months. We are making progress, but we are far from done.

Our Committee began with high aspirations, but we soon stumbled. We had some early staffing difficulties along with some false starts on our hearing schedule.

Early on, our inquiry turned up only information that provided to us. Our separate joint staff was dependent upon the information provided by our intelligence agencies, which were reluctant to cooperate fully.

While our joint staff was working in the agencies, they were often isolated in rooms constantly monitored by agency staff. Agencies refused to circulate the joint staff's contact information and forbade them from meeting with anyone without agency supervision.

While our staff was allowed to view large quantities of documents, they were not allowed to make copies of all of them. Therefore, the process of documenting certain events became very onerous and time consuming.

Other agencies refused to allow the joint staff to interview key individuals. They were told that they could speak to supervisors and more senior personnel who often knew few, if any, details.

Many of these problems were ultimately worked out, but that took precious time, time we did not have. Some of the problems persist today. For example, we are often arguing with agencies about who may or may not appear before our committees as late as the day before they are scheduled to appear. Witnesses are requested, refused, requested again, granted and then, at the last minute, refused again.

There also remains a body of documents that the Director of Central Intelligence refuses to allow the committees to retain.

Much of the information that we gather is classified. The process of declassification has taken an inordinate amount of time. Often we are still in the process of determining what we can discuss publicly moments before a hearing.

It is this type of interaction that cannot be completely characterized as uncooperative but is, nonetheless, extremely counterproductive and has slowed the progress of this investigation. We are, however, making progress.

The staff has reviewed many thousands of documents, but they have many thousands yet to review.

They have interviewed many people, but there are many yet to interview.

In fact, it is still very difficult even to determine how far we have come, and almost impossible to tell how far we have yet to go.

I have been a part of many investigations in my career but none has been as important as this one. Almost 3,000 Americans have been murdered, and perhaps thousands more innocent lives hang in the balance every day. Our joint investigation must be thorough, comprehensive and complete. I want it to be a success.

To be a success, however, an inquiry needs time and resources. If you limit either one, your chances of success diminish significantly. Unfortunately, we have a short supply of both and I am afraid that we are beginning to reap the results.

From the outset, I argued strongly that our committees should avoid setting arbitrary deadlines. Deadlines are an invitation to stonewalling and foot-dragging, and we have seen some of both in our effort.

I have also said many times that agencies under the congressional microscope are generally not motivated to cooperate. To be thorough, we must be able to identify and locate relevant information, retrieve it, and then analyze it in the context of all of other information we have gathered. This is inevitably a difficult and time-consuming undertaking.

Because we have only one to three staffers actually focusing on any particular agency at any one time—and because so much of our joint inquiry staff resources are tied up in producing hearings—it has become exceedingly difficult to be as thorough and probing as we need to be.

At this point, I do not believe we will be able to complete the job the American people expect us to do. However, I expect us to do a credible job and to lay the predicate for future investigations.

While I continue to work on the joint effort, I believe ours must be a prelude to a more comprehensive inquiry. Therefore, I intend to support the creation of a commission, and I urge my colleagues to do the same this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. LIEBERMAN, has more to say. I don't believe there is anyone speaking in opposition to this amendment. The Senator from Connecticut, Mr. DODD, was here earlier this morning to speak about STROM THURMOND. He was squeezed out by the majority leader, the Republican leader, Senator BYRD, Senator HOLLINGS, and others. I therefore ask unanimous consent that when the Senator from Connecticut finishes his few minutes, Senator DODD be recognized using the 7½ minutes in opposition to this amendment and 2½ minutes, for a total of 10 minutes, to speak as if in morning business prior to the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I do not object to my colleague from Connecticut speaking. I want Senator REID to know I would not be surprised to see the Senator from Arizona, Mr. MCCAIN, a cosponsor of the amendment, on the floor hoping to say a few words. I will be mindful of that.

The creation of a Department of Homeland Security, in which we're now engaged, is an urgent investment in the present and future safety of America. We need to take this step, and we need to take it now.

But even as we do, we must recognize that we're acting on an incomplete picture of the problems that need to be fixed. We're relying on partial and sporadic reports about how the government failed to meet the challenge of securing our homeland pre-September 11.

When the new department gets up and running, we owe it to ourselves, and to the country we're striving to secure, to give it as complete and independent an assessment as possible of what went wrong before September 11 and why. If we don't come to terms with the whole truth by looking back at what happened, we can never move forward with the knowledge and confidence we need to set things right.

Since September 11, all of us, and particularly the families of the victims, have been subjected to the wrenching process of learning about their government's failures through a tortuous trickle of leaks and soundbites.

All of this has hurt the nation psychologically by increasing anxiety and feeding speculation, leaving doubts about whether our government has come to terms with the full scope of the failures that allowed those terrible attacks to succeed. It has also damaged our spirit by turning almost every revelation into a regrettable volley of charges and counter-charges. And it has hurt us practically by failing to give us a clear, clean picture—with perspectives, context, nuance and shades of gray—of what agencies failed, how they failed, and why. As we begin to build a Department of Homeland Security, we will need that picture to make sure we do it right.

I do want to pay tribute to the joint House-Senate Intelligence Committees, which have uncovered valuable and disturbing evidence of the intelligence community's failure to share and capitalize on information about the hijackers, in the months preceding September 11.

As Senator JOHN MCCAIN and I see it, a non-political, blue-ribbon commission would build on the joint committees' work—reviewing their findings and continuing to explore areas they touched on—as part of a sober, comprehensive inquiry into all our pre-September 11 institutional shortcomings.

I also must add that I was enormously gratified last Friday when the administration reversed its long-standing opposition to creating an independent commission. Last November, even before we began drafting a bill, Senator MCCAIN and I wrote the President inviting him to work with us. Since we never heard back, we introduced legislation in December. In the intervening months, we held an informative hearing on the proposal, reported it out of the Governmental Affairs Committee, which I am privileged to chair, and eventually won the backing of 22 co-sponsors from both parties. As was the case with creating a Department of Homeland Security, I welcome the administration's support—regardless of when it arrives.

Since Friday, we have entered into discussions with the administration, which requested a variety of changes. Assuming passage of the amendment today, we will gladly continue these talks.

This amendment is based on S. 1867, legislation I introduced with Senator MCCAIN on December 20 of last year. The legislation has been revised as it made its way through the legislative process. The Committee on Governmental Affairs heard from a distinguished panel of witnesses at a February hearing. The witnesses, all of whom had served on past commissions, recommended an inquiry by an independent commission into the September 11 terrorist attacks. The bill was reported out of committee by voice vote on March 21 of this year. I refer my colleagues to the committee's written report, No. 107-150, for a fuller explanation of the legislation's, and this amendment's, context, purposes and justification. The bill reported out of committee contained some changes from our original version. Several of those changes were the result of our discussions with Senator TORRICELLI, who had introduced a similar bill with Senator GRASSLEY and others. Others were the result of the recommendations of our hearing witnesses and extensive consultations with experts.

Last Thursday I described several ways in which the amendment we are voting on today differs from S. 1867, the bill that was reported out of committee. The amendment would ensure an even division between Republicans and Democrats in choosing commission members—with the majority parties in the Senate and the House receiving three picks each, while the minority parties in each house get two picks each. This is the configuration of an equivalent commission recently created by the House, and it has other notable precedent, in the form of the National Commission on Terrorism, created by Congress in 1999, and headed by former Ambassador Paul Bremer.

There are three other changes from the text of S. 1867. The amendment emphasizes that the Commission should build upon the work of Congressional committees and other inquiries, especially the joint inquiry of the Senate and House Intelligence Committees regarding the terrorist attacks. We do not by any means intend this change to suggest that the Commission should avoid looking at specific issues related to intelligence just because the Committees had investigated the same issues. Rather, the Commission should use the Committees' fine report as a resource, as it continues to review the role of the intelligence community.

The amendment also provides that the Vice Chairperson of the Commission, in addition to the Chairperson and others, can issue subpoenas. The amendment envisions a Vice-Chairperson with powers and responsibilities essentially equivalent to that of the Chair. This model worked very well in the case of the National Commission on Terrorism. Finally, the amendment makes technical improvements to the bill's alternative subpoena enforcement mechanism.

As Senator McCAIN and I envision it, the commission would have purview over a broad range of areas. Of course, it would examine intelligence shortcomings, which are at the very core of our failure to anticipate September 11th. But it could also scrutinize a variety of other factors—law enforcement, immigration and border control, foreign policy, commercial aviation, for example—before recommending reforms.

Commission members would be private citizens—not elected officials—with expertise in a range of subjects related to what went wrong on September 11th. And the commission would have subpoena power and the right to meet in private session. It would also have enough time, a top level staff, ample investigatory powers, and adequate funding to perform its job properly.

We are not interested in using this commission to point fingers across the room. I hope and believe that an independent commission will make the government as a whole look in the mirror. After all, it is our common security, and improving it is our common responsibility.

We have a history of learning from history. America's first day of infamy, Pearl Harbor, was followed both by congressional investigations and by an independent commission. In the wake of other national tragedies—the assassination of President Kennedy, for example, and the Challenger explosion—similar independent investigations were launched immediately.

In the last two decades, investigative panels were convened after devastating terrorist attacks against U.S. military and diplomatic facilities, including the Marine barracks in Beirut; Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia; U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania; and the USS Cole. In 1989—after months of pressure from Congress and families of victims—the first President Bush created a commission to investigate the Pan Am bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland.

Essential lessons were learned from each of these inquiries, and the inquiries represent a recognition in the value of immediately reviewing terrorist attacks, to provide vital information about possible vulnerabilities which could be corrected. The commission we propose would build on those examples.

I have heard the criticism that recommendations of commissions are not followed, and therefore the modest expense in establishing them is not justified. Yet past commissions, with a small investment of resources, have had a real impact. Just ask Donald Rumsfeld: the Commission to Assess the Ballistic Missile Threat to the United States, which he chaired, recast our assumptions about the ballistic missile threat. What better evidence can there be than the homeland security legislation we are debating today, modeled closely on the recommendations of the prescient Hart-Rudman Commission? The National Commission on Terrorism issued a litany of policy prescriptions ranging from domestic law enforcement to intelligence to foreign policy—a number of those immediately passed the Senate, and more have been implemented since the September 11 attacks. And if in the past we had been lulled into complacency that we were safe against terrorism within our borders, how can anyone doubt that the enormity of the September 11 attacks will not keep this nation focused on what needs to be done?

At our Governmental Affairs Committee hearing on the commission bill in February, Columbia University Professor Richard Betts, who served on the National Commission on Terrorism, said an independent commission is important because it would conduct a quote "sober investigation that the public could have confidence is as objective as humanly possible." This is our goal.

I have met with families of September 11th victims on several occasions, and their desire for this commission is the strongest argument I can present on its behalf. The persistent advocacy of Stephen Push, Kristen Breitweiser, Mary Fetchet, Beverly Eckert, Monica Gabrielle, and many others—despite their devastating loss—has inspired my profound respect.

Husbands, wives, and children were murdered on September 11th. Their survivors need to come to terms with what happened so that they may move on with their lives. The families want answers to questions that echo in my own mind and heart: Why was such a simple plan so successful in achieving its evil goals? What opportunities were missed to prevent the destruction?

At a June rally organized by family members in support of this legislation, Mindy Kleinberg, a mother of three who lost her husband, Alan, on September 11th, told the New York Times—"I want to be able to look into the eyes of my children, and tell them the evil is over there, that they are safe, and that their country is secure. Nine months have passed, and I still cannot do that. I do not have answers."

Let us help these families—and the nation they represent—find closure. Three thousand men, women, and children of America's family were murdered. We need definitive answers that force us to face what happened and why—answers that will ultimately lead to a stronger and better America, and an America less tortured by piecemeal speculations about what might have been.

President John F. Kennedy said, "In the long history of the world, only a few generations have been granted the role of defending freedom in its hour of maximum danger. I do not shrink from this responsibility; I welcome it."

We too must welcome it, with a strong vote in favor of creating this commission so that we might live well-informed and therefore safer lives in the future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I will stand by what I have said before in behalf of the commission.

I yield the floor at this point to my friend from Connecticut under the previous order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I will keep an eye on the door. If our friend from Arizona comes through the door, I will abbreviate my remarks.

(The remarks of Mr. DODD are printed in today's RECORD under "Morning Business.")

Mr. DODD. I see my colleague from Arizona on the floor. I know he wishes to be heard on this amendment.

I yield the floor to my colleague from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank my colleague from Connecticut.

Mr. President, are we still going to vote at 2:15?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been extended by 2 minutes.

Mr. McCAIN. By 2 minutes. I will take about 3 minutes, if that is OK with my other friend from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arizona, who has been such a leader in this effort, be allowed to speak for up to 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the Chair and thank my friend from Connecticut, Senator DODD. And I hope he will always yield to me when I arrive on the floor. I appreciate it.

Mr. President, I rise today to urge my colleagues to vote to create a commission, composed of the most credible people in America, that will tell the American people the truth about how our Government was not prepared for the threat of catastrophic terrorism last September.

To question American policies and practices in the months and years before September 11 is not to engage in a political witch hunt intended to score partisan points against one administration or another. To probe deeply but fairly into American policies predating the terrorist attacks is to examine the scale of American leaders' failure to imagine and plan for a contingency that was not, in fact, unimaginable. By American leaders, I mean the Congress, as well as other branches of Government. A thorough, nonpartisan investigation would provide an informed basis for the current administration and the Congress to take all necessary measures to ensure that our country is prepared to meet the challenges of this age of terrorism.

On Friday, the White House announced its support for an independent commission to address "the panapoly of other important and related issues as they may relate to September 11" and "strengthen our ability to prevent and defend against terrorism and protect the security of the American public." We will continue to work with the administration to refine our legislation and appreciate their support. We look forward to continuing our dialogue with the White House as the homeland security bill moves through conference. We are also pleased to have the support of Senators SHELBY and GRAHAM, the Senate leaders of the joint congressional investigation into last year's attacks.

The attacks on September 11 represented more than a failure of intelligence. They highlighted a failure of national policy to respond to the development of a global terror network implacably hostile to American interests. In 1989, the United States walked away from Afghanistan after fighting a proxy war against occupying Soviet forces. The subsequent civil war created the conditions for the rise of the Taliban, as the Afghan people submitted to a totalitarian government that imposed order over the chaos of warlord rule. The United States stood by passively as the Taliban formed an alliance with Osama bin Laden that turned Afghanistan into a sovereign training camp for al-Qaida to prepare its attacks on America as it built a global network of terror. American leaders, including those of us in Congress, watched and knew all of this.

The United States declined to respond meaningfully to terrorist attacks against our interests throughout the previous decade—again, a failure of national policy over the course of successive administrations and many Congresses that encouraged our enemies to perceive us as weak and unwilling to defend our interests. The 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center; the 1995 and 1996 bombings of American targets in Saudi Arabia; the 1998 attacks on our Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania; the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole—all of these attacks were preludes of growing intensity to the attacks against New York and Washington, DC.

In retrospect, a pattern becomes clear, a period in which the preeminent threat to American national security arose from the ashes of war and chaos in Afghanistan while the United States preoccupied itself elsewhere. We need to absorb the lessons of our failure so that, as after other national tragedies such as Pearl Harbor and the Kennedy assassination, we can tell those we are privileged to lead that evil men will never perpetrate such horror again. This commission will help us do that.

I thank my dear friend and colleague, the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. LIEBERMAN, for his leadership, and I look forward to us completing this job.

I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, is there time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 2½ minutes remaining in opposition.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I thank the Chair.

I wanted to say a personal word about the extraordinary way in which the families of so many of those who were lost on September 11 have taken their unspeakable losses and personal grief and turned it into remarkable, continuing acts of advocacy for action by our Government to guarantee, as best any human can, that no other families will suffer the losses that they have suffered.

These families have pushed relentlessly, and with such principle and purpose, for the creation of this commission to answer the question that they naturally ask, that we all ask but they ask it with a personal poignancy: How could this have happened?

Earlier this year, at a rally of family members in support of the creation of just such a commission as our amendment would provide, Mindy Kleinberg, a mother of three, who lost her husband, Alan, last September 11, said:

> I want to be able to look into the eyes of my children and tell them the evil is over there, that they are safe, and that their country is secure. . . . Months have passed, and I still cannot do that. I do not have answers.

The purpose of this commission is to provide those answers for Mrs. Kleinberg, for her children, for all the survivors and friends, and for all Americans, to make sure their Government is doing everything it humanly can to prevent anything like the tragic attacks of September 11 of 2001 from ever happening again.

I think this is our best way to do that. I urge the adoption of this amendment.

I yield back the remaining time that I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to amendment No. 4694. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. REID. I announce that the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The amendment (No. 4694) was agreed to.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. REID. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, it is my understanding we are now on the homeland security legislation; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I have spoken with the minority. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from West Virginia, the President pro tempore of the Senate, be recognized to speak for up to 1 hour as in morning business. I have spoken with Senator GRAMM, and he is not quite ready to offer his amendment. He said he would be ready at or about 3 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that at 3:40 p.m. we return to this bill. At that time, Senator SANTORUM indicated he might be present in the Chamber to talk about legislation he has. At that time, we will move forward on the legislation, hoping Senator GRAMM is ready to offer his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CLINTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from West Virginia.

PROGRESS ON THE FISCAL YEAR 2003 APPROPRIATIONS BILLS

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, the appropriations process is stalled. To use an overused expression: It is dead in the water. Certain Members in the other body have asserted that progress on the 13 appropriations bills for the fiscal year that begins October 1 has been slowed because Senate Democrats want to have a spending spree. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Nearly 2 months ago, on July 25, the Senate Appropriations Committee reported the thirteenth and final appropriations bill for fiscal year 2003, the earliest this has been accomplished since 1988. All 13 bills are bipartisan, and all 13 bills are fiscally responsible. There was not a single vote in committee against any of the 13 bills. Republicans and Democrats on the committee voted for these bills.

The bills totaled $768.1 billion and are consistent with the committee allocation approved by a vote of 29 to 0 in June. The 13 bills are consistent with the $768.1 billion allocation that was approved by the Senate Budget Committee when it reported its budget resolution last March. The bills are consistent with the $768.1 billion allocation that was supported by 59 Members of the Senate when the allocation was voted on during floor debate on the Defense authorization bill on June 20.

The holdup in the appropriations process is because the White House is giving marching orders to the House of Representatives. Regrettably, the House Appropriations Committee has reported only 8 of the bills compared to the Senate Appropriations Committee's 13. The House has passed only 5 of those 8 bills.

I stress that the holdup is not the fault of the House Appropriations Committee chaired by Mr. YOUNG of Florida. It is not the fault of that committee. They have wanted to do their work.

The holdup is a result of the House Republican leadership decision to stop all House floor action on appropriations bills. Perhaps the decision is being handed down from on high to the House Republican leadership. The House has not adopted an appropriations bill since July 24. With only 1 week to go before the beginning of the fiscal year, the House has not passed an appropriations bill in almost 9 weeks.

For the record, let me state that there is no scheme in the Senate to explode spending—none. Surely I would have heard about it if there were such. The Senate Appropriations Committee has produced 13 bills that total $768.1 billion plus $2.2 billion in emergency spending for FEMA disaster relief, low-income home energy assistance, and funds to fight fires. The committee also approved an additional $2.2 billion of advance appropriations for programs to help educate disadvantaged and disabled children. No tricks. As Shakespeare said: There are no tricks in plain and simple faith. No hiding the ball; no hat trick here.

Our 13 bills have been available for all the world to see for 2 months. The House is not moving forward as a result of a political dispute over the ceiling for spending in fiscal year 2003. The House Republican leadership, in collaboration with the White House, is insisting on the level of $759.1 billion. Yet the House Appropriations Committee has not been able to stretch those dollars far enough to write their bills.

The House Republican leadership has been informed by many members of their own caucus that they cannot vote for the Labor-HHS-Education bill at the levels requested by the President because that bill shortchanges America's classrooms and ignores our pressing health care needs. Yet, inexplicably, instead of changing course, the House Republican leadership has shut the appropriations process down.

Could it be because, with an election looming some members of the House want to avoid certain votes? If the Republican leadership has forsaken its duty to make careful choices for the American people and is driving the Congress toward a long-term continuing resolution, that means putting the Government on auto-pilot. This is the worst possible way to govern. It allows for obfuscation and abuse. It ignores critical needs.

In order to cover the politics involved which are the real reasons for the delay, the administration characterizes the $13 billion of additional spending in the Senate bills as "wasteful spending." Frankly, this is just simplistic, political rhetoric.

The administration tries to point political fingers at the Senate charging that we are spending too much on domestic programs. But where is the real growth in spending? The President proposed a 13 percent, or $45 billion, increase in spending for our Nation's defense programs. Let us note that the $759 billion ceiling forced the House to cut the President's request for the Department of Defense by $1.6 billion. The $768 billion ceiling available in the Senate allowed the Senate to restore $1.2 billion of that cut in DoD and the funds are being used for military readiness programs, for essential military construction programs, and for counter terrorism projects. In addition, the Senate was able to add $375 million to the President's February request for nuclear programs at the Department of Energy.

The President proposed a 25 percent increase in domestic homeland security programs. The $768 billion Senate level permitted the Senate to fully fund essential homeland defense investments such as additional firefighting funds, additional funds for port security, State and local law enforcement, and border security. Unfortunately, the House ceiling on spending is so low that the House Appropriations Committee has not even been able to mark up the Veterans/HUD/Independent Agencies bill and the Commerce/Justice/State bill which provide funding for many homeland defense programs. Yet the White House requested these increases, and they are obviously critically important for the security of our people.

When it comes to domestic programs other than homeland defense, the President proposed to freeze spending at the FY 2002 levels. That is a hard freeze with no adjustment for inflation or for other factors such as a growing population or growing unemployment. The $768 billion Senate level permitted the Senate Appropriations Committee to increase domestic programs by 2.6 percent. Not 13 percent, not 25 percent, just 2.6 percent for the domestic programs that serve our Nation.

And for what did we use that 2.6 percent increase?

We used it to increase funding for veterans medical care by $1.1 billion above the President's request. There are currently over 280,000 veterans on waiting lists for VA medical care. The President's request just did not adequately fund veterans' needs.

If I ever saw a veteran, there sits one in the chair presiding over the Senate of the United States. There is a man who has given everything but his life for this country. I would be ashamed to run against him.

With war drums beating all around us, I think we ought to be very careful to send the message to our veterans that we will take care of their present and future needs.

Last year, Congress passed the No Child Left Behind Act with broad, bipartisan support. But, this law becomes nothing but an unfunded mandate on our local governments if the Federal funding is not there for States to implement the new act. It takes money to reduce class sizes, to provide teacher training, to invest in new technology and to develop meaningful assessment tools. The Senate Committee bill increases education funding by $3.2 billion, or 6.5 percent, six times the meager 1 percent increase proposed by the President. Rhetoric is fine, but when it comes to our children's education we have to put our money where our mouth is, as the old saying goes.

The Senate used the 2.6 percent increase to make sure that we could keep Amtrak operating. A bankrupt Amtrak would mean that 23,000 employees would be thrown on to the unemployment line. Some 500 communities served by Amtrak would lose intercity passenger rail service forever, including 130 communities that have no air service whatsoever, and 113 communities that don't even have intercity bus service. It means the termination not just of Amtrak service across the Nation but also the termination of commuter rail service from Boston to California because many of these services are either operated under contract by Amtrak or they run over railroad tracks that are owned by Amtrak. Some 1.7 million citizens that ride Amtrak each month will lose service. So will roughly 4.2 million citizens that use those commuter rail services each month. If you think the highways are crowded during the morning and evening commuting times, just wait until Amtrak and the commuter rail systems are terminated overnight.

Last, January, in the State of the Union, the President said, "When America works, America prospers, so my economic security plan can be summed up in one word: jobs." Yet his budget proposed to dramatically cut highway spending below last year's level. For every billion dollars we spend on highways, we create 42,000 jobs. The Senate bill provides an obligation limit that restores the $8.6 billion cut proposed by the President's request, saving over 350,000 jobs. The President talks about jobs but the modest increase in domestic spending contained in the Senate bills actually creates jobs.

We used the 2.6 percent increase to provide for a $184 million increase above the President's request for the Securities and Exchange Commission. If the Congress is serious about rooting out corporate fraud, the SEC needs the resources to hire investigators and to fund the newly established Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, as authorized in the Sarbanes-Oxley Corporate Accountability Act of 2002.

We used the 2.6 percent increase to increase funding for job-training programs by more than half a billion dollars over the President. This is at a time when more than 8 million Americans are unemployed and there has been an increase of more than one million unemployed persons in just the last 12 months.

We used the 2.6 percent increase to restore over $94 million in cuts proposed by the President in Fossil Energy Research and Development programs and provide for a $58 million increase.

If the administration wants to reduce the nation's dependence on foreign oil, it is not going to do so by cutting our investment in fossil fuels, as proposed by the President. At a time when a new war in the Gulf may have long-term implications for this nation's energy security, it is vitally important that the United States continue to explore and develop new technologies which allow us to tap our own abundant energy supplies. We should have been working on energy independence diligently for the last 20 years. But the oil interests that bankroll politicians have been too strong. Now we see the cost of bowing to King Oil.

We used the modest increase in domestic spending to increase funding by $200 million above the President's request for Head Start. In his State of the Union Address, the President stated that: "We need to prepare our children to read and succeed in school with improved Head Start and early childhood development programs." The Senate bill would result in 17,000 more low-income children being served.

We used the 2.6 percent increase to restore over $900 million of cuts proposed by the President in Justice Department programs for State and local law enforcement. With State and local governments cutting their budgets—and they are cutting them. We read about cuts in the budgets for the States of Maryland and Virginia. With State and local governments cutting their budgets in response to the recent recession, does the President think that we will make our Nation more secure by cutting law enforcement grants to State and local governments?

These are just a few examples of how the Senate used the modest $13 billion increase above the House allocation. Is that $13 billion increase excessive? No. Is it wasteful? No.

I believe it is prudent. It is thoughtful. It is the result of careful decision making, done on a bipartisan basis. And most of it has gone to fund either national defense or homeland security.

The choices we make in the Congress about how we allocate the people's money should be based on hard work and careful analysis. It should not be based on a simplistic review of the facts, nor should it be distorted by the save-your-hide mentality—the save-your-hide mentality—of an election year. Recently, the Congress approved a $5.1 billion emergency contingency fund, including $2.5 billion for homeland defense programs. Based on the recommendation of Office of Management and Budget Director Mitch Daniels, the President chose to cancel that funding, explaining that it was "wasteful spending." Yet, with one exception, he chose not to identify the "wasteful spending." Was it the airport security funding or the funding to secure our nation's nuclear weapons complex? Was it the funds to train and equip our Nation's firefighters? Was it the funding for veterans medical care or the funding to fulfill the President's commitment to fight the global AIDS epidemic? Which of these programs that protect American lives does the President consider to be "wasteful"?

The President never answered those questions. Instead, the one example of wasteful spending that the President chose to give was $2 million for a single project, which the President himself has chosen to fund in the 2003 budget. If it was wasteful spending in 2002, why is it not wasteful spending in 2003? If it is worth spending in 2003, why not spend it in 2002? The rest of the money he did not spend, he gave no reason for withholding. It was money for homeland security. It was money to make us safer here at home. Sometimes, I just have to question the sincerity of an effort on homeland security which seems based almost wholly on sound bites.

The President, through his Director of the Office of Management and Budget, is currently working with the House Republican leadership to force the funding of the entire domestic side of the Government into a long-term continuing resolution for nearly half the fiscal year. Something is going on. They want to put the education of our children, the care of our veterans, and our investments in homeland security on automatic pilot at last year's funding levels because we are in an election year.

Last week, the President's chief economic adviser, Lawrence Lindsey, was asked by a reporter for the Wall Street Journal what he thought the cost of the war in Iraq might be and what the impact of that cost might be on our Nation's economy. He responded by estimating that the cost would likely be between $100 billion and $200 billion. How about that. That is just pocket change—small. Oh, somewhere between $100 billion and $200 billion. When asked what the impact of that $100-$200 billion expenditure would be on the economy, the President's chief economic adviser said, "That's nothing." Nothing.

The administration believes that $100-$200 billion of spending on the war on Iraq will have no impact on the economy, but $13 billion more of needed spending on our nation's education, public health, veterans medical care and transportation systems is wasteful.

In just 2 years the projected $359 billion surplus for Fiscal Year 2003 has swung wildly to a projected deficit of $145 billion. The Senate Budget Committee estimates that of that $504 billion swing, $404 billion came from reduced revenues or interest payments on those reduced revenues. In other words, 80 percent of the lost surplus in Fiscal Year 2003 came from reduced revenues. Another 5 percent came from increased defense spending. Another 9 percent of the lost surplus came from expenditures related to the response to the attacks of September 11, 2001. Approximately 4 percent came from increased mandatory spending such as the farm bill. And, how about domestic spending? How much of the $504 billion swing in the surplus estimate came from domestic discretionary spending? Just 1 percent.

Just 1 percent of that dramatic swing in the surplus estimate for Fiscal Year 2003 came about from increased discretionary spending. Yet, this small portion of the budget is what the White House political manipulators will endeavor to highlight and blame for every blemish in our fiscal picture.

The game, of course, is to wrap the bills up, take them behind closed doors—aha, I have been behind those closed doors—take them behind closed doors, where this White House is most comfortable and do deals that benefit the White House. Never mind about the horrendous and irresponsible policy of government by continuing resolution. Never mind, never mind C.R.s.

Let me give you just a few examples of what will happen if we have a continuing resolution until March, compared to the levels in the bi-partisan Senate Appropriations Committee-reported bills. Now listen:

The number of farm operating loans, during the most important part of the growing season, will be cut from 6,643 to 3,435. That is not all.

The number of multi-family homes built in rural America will be reduced by 2,500.

The number of homes in rural America that will be rehabilitated for low-income families will be reduced by 8,243.

The funding to help State and local governments—hear me now. Can you hear me now, Governor Wise, down there in Charlestown, WV? Governor Wise, listen.

Funding to help State and local governments develop their capacity to respond to or prevent terrorist attacks would be reduced from $2 billion in the Senate bill to only $651 million under the continuing resolution.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service is at a critical juncture in developing a comprehensive entry/exit system to protect our Nation's borders. Only $13.3 million would be available under a CR compared to $362 million in the Senate bill, resulting in a significant delay in this system.

I should repeat that statement.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service is at a critical juncture in developing a comprehensive entry/exit system to protect our Nation's borders. Only $13.3 million would be available under a continuing resolution compared to $362 million in the Senate bill resulting in a significant delay in this system.

The Securities and Exchange Commission would have to terminate all hiring, including 100 additional staff funded in the last supplemental to investigate corporate fraud.

Hear this now. Nuclear plants in Tennessee and Texas will have to lay off 240 security guards.

Every 6 seconds another person is infected with the AIDS virus. Every 6 seconds—1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6—another person is infected with the AIDS virus.

AIDS has killed more than 25 million people, and at the rate at which it is spreading, the number of people to die of AIDS-related causes may reach 65 million by the year 2020—just 18 years from now. Each year, mother-to-child transmission of the AIDS virus kills half a million children, and infects another 600,000. On June 19, President Bush announced, with considerable fanfare, a $500 million initiative to save children from AIDS. He said: "Today, I call on other industrialized nations and international organizations to join this crucial effort to save children from disease and death." Yet under a continuing resolution, international AIDS funding would be cut by $225 million.

Come, my western friends.

Critical funding for fighting fires that have been raging across the land would be eliminated;

$716 million worth of anti-terrorism, force protection projects sought by the Defense Department—projects that are designed to better protect our military installations at home and abroad from terrorist attack—would be put on hold.

More than $1 billion worth of family housing construction projects and another $1 billion worth of barracks construction would be stopped dead in their tracks. Military personnel and their families, already facing the strains of war, would be dealt further delays in what is their number one quality-of-life issue.

A long-term continuing resolution will severely undermine the ability of the new Transportation Security Administration to improve aviation security and security in all other transportation modes. Many of the requirements of the new Transportation Security Act are going to require large expenditures in the first quarter of fiscal year 2003. These expenditures involve continued purchases of explosive detection equipment to keep bombs from being placed on our airliners. Funds are also needed to hire new federal screeners and make our nation's seaports more secure.

A long-term continuing resolution will likely result in the bankruptcy of Amtrak. Amtrak is still just barely surviving, managing its available cash to survive on a day-to-day basis until Congress can provide it a major necessary cash infusion as part of the appropriations process for 2003. If we suspend the completion of the appropriations process until the third quarter of the year, Amtrak will be declaring bankruptcy before Christmas. Bye, bye, Santa Claus.

A long-term continuing resolution would seriously undermine air safety. Just this past summer, we came within weeks of seeing the FAA furlough air traffic controllers for lack of available funding. A long-term continuing resolution at current rates would result in not replacing the hundreds of air traffic controllers, safety inspectors and maintenance technicians that would retire or leave the agency during the first half of the fiscal year. The safety of our skies will be left to a continuously dwindling number of controllers. All this would be happening at a time when we are trying to get Americans to fly again after the events of September 11.

A long-term continuing resolution would result in the Customs Service having to defer the hiring of more than 628 inspectors and agents for posting at high-risk land and sea ports-of-entry.

Come on, now. Hasn't the President been out there talking about how we should ram through this homeland security bill?

A long-term continuing resolution would result, as I say again, in the Customs Service having to defer the hiring of more than 628 inspectors and agents for posting at high-risk land and sea ports of entry.

A long-term continuing resolution means thousands of FEMA fire grants, grants for interoperable communications equipment, grants to upgrade emergency operations centers, grants to upgrade search and rescue teams, grants for emergency responder training and grants to improve state and local planning would be delayed for at least 5 months.

Under a long-term CR, the VA health care system will be funded at a level that is $2.4 billion short of the level proposed in the Senate passed fiscal year 2003 VA-HUD bill. Without increased resources, VA may not be able to sustain open enrollment for all veterans.

There are currently over 280,000 veterans on waiting lists for VA medical care. Under a long-term continuing resolution, the waiting list will more than double.

The VA will schedule 2.5 million fewer outpatient clinic appointments for veterans, and 235,000 fewer veterans will be treated in VA hospitals.

And these are only the items—I have just named a few—these are the only items which can be known and computed at this time. Only God knows—only God knows—what other nasty little problems will result from the OMB's—the Office of Management and Budget's—interpretation of the continuing resolution.

If President George W. Bush is planning to take our Nation to war again in the Persian Gulf, the American people should not have to worry about whether we are securing our homeland, whether their children are in small classes, with qualified teachers, whether Amtrak will go bankrupt or whether our veterans are getting proper care. This President, so eager for war abroad, should pause for a moment, and lay aside the war plans long enough to work with the Congress on a prudent and responsible level of spending here at home for the American people.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAYTON. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DAYTON. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, I would like to ask the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, if he has a minute, a question.

The President took office saying he was going to change the tone of the debate in Washington. The Senator has served with a number of other Presidents—Democrat and Republican—in the past. I wonder if the Senator believes that the tone has been changed for the better or for the worse?

If I am not correct, hasn't the Senator attempted, on numerous occasions, to work in a constructive and cooperative fashion with the White House in fashioning this budget, this spending plan; and hasn't the Senator been rebuffed in those efforts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. May I respond to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. If the Senator is referring to the numerous occasions on which my dear colleague, Senator TED STEVENS—who sits across the other side of the aisle—and I sought to have the President send up to the Senate Appropriations Committee, as a witness, the distinguished former Governor of Pennsylvania, the Homeland Security Director, Mr. Tom Ridge, the answer is, yes, yes, yes. And we met with failure in all of our efforts.

We even wrote to the President, asking that he have Senator STEVENS and myself come down to the White House and appear before the President to make our case.

Mr. DAYTON. Madam President, may I also ask——

Mr. BYRD. May I say, Senator STEVENS and I weren't even shown the courtesy of a response from the President. Some of his underlings—I have great respect for them—some of his underlings responded: The answer is no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAYTON. I appreciate the Senator's candor with regard to the numbers that have been presented here today because it is my understanding—and I am glad the Senator refreshed my memory—that the spending proposals that the administration has sent to the Congress were, in fact, a significant increase, 9 percent, or I believe the Senator said a 13-percent increase in discretionary spending from this fiscal year over to the next, an unheard of increase in discretionary spending.

It is also my recollection—I believe the Senator pointed this out—that, with the change in the budget predictions, the country has gone from looking at surpluses over the next decade to looking at a string of deficits over the next decade.

It is this Senator's impression that the administration is trying to put the blame for this fiscal disarray on the Senate or on the House when, in fact, it is the administration's own tax and spending proposals which have created these deficits for this year and for next year, and for as far as the eye can see, and has caused this financial burden to be placed on future generations.

It seems to this Senator that this administration is trying, with these tiny little numbers, relatively speaking, to put the blame where it does not belong, which is on this body.

I wonder if the Senator will comment on that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. The Senator from Minnesota is very perspicacious in his observations.

I am at a loss to understand why we should not be working on our appropriations bills. Here we have had one on this floor stalled for many days.

The distinguished Republican chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and the Democratic ranking minority member over there, and the ranking minority member over on this side of the Capitol, Senator STEVENS, and I have talked about it, moving our bills.

We had a meeting a few days ago, and the very able chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Mr. YOUNG, from Florida, importuned me and my friend, Senator TED STEVENS, to please have a meeting with the able Speaker of the House and with the majority leader of the House and with the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and the ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee—have a meeting and explain to them how necessary it is for us to move, get on these appropriations bills, have the conferences, bring back the conference reports, show some action, some progress on these appropriations bills.

And we got a turndown. We got a turndown, from what I understand through my staff. The House leadership, for whatever its reasons, did not want to have that meeting.

So here we are, marking time. Time is passing. We will soon be at the beginning of a new fiscal year, and the appropriations bills are dead in the water. Why?

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAYTON. I thank the Chair.

On that subject, I say to the Senator, I recall last year, with the new administration, there was considerable delay in the Senate receiving the administration's spending request, so there were delays in the process resulting from that. This year I believe the chairman of the Appropriations Committee took great measures to assure a timely disposition of these spending bills.

It is my understanding that the Senate Appropriations Committee reported these measures out in a very expeditious fashion so they could all be passed by the Senate and conferenced before the beginning of the new fiscal year.

Is that the record as the chairman has lived through it?

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, that is an accurate statement on the part of the able Senator from Minnesota. I believe the Appropriations Committee in the Senate completed our 13 appropriations bills almost 2 months ago—July 25, the earliest since 1988. If the world wants to see a committee that really operates in a bipartisan way, take a look at the Senate Appropriations Committee.

The Republican former chairman, Mr. STEVENS, and I and all of the members on that committee, Democrats and Republicans, work together. The subcommittee chairmen and the ranking members of those subcommittees work together. There is no bickering about politics in that committee.

Again, we have reported these 13 appropriations bills, and they have been just hanging out there. We can't get any movement. We can't get any work done. Why? Why all this holdup?

Why doesn't the White House, instead of pointing the finger at the Senate and saying, they are guilty of wasteful spending, or pointing to the Congress and saying, pass my homeland security bill, why doesn't the White House meet its responsibilities to the American people and provide homeland security by signing those appropriations bills?

No, the President apparently was advised by persons who seem to prefer to play politics over serving the American people by moving these appropriations bills and enhancing the homeland security of all Americans.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BYRD. I will gladly yield.

Mr. REID. Would the distinguished Senator from West Virginia explain to the American people what he and Senator STEVENS did so that all 13 appropriations bills would be within the so-called budget so that we would not exceed numbers that, if we had come here and passed a budget, it would have been the same?

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, the able Senator from Alaska, Mr. STEVENS—a man who is deserving of the title of "The Alaskan of the 20th Century"—and I always work together closely. Our subcommittee chairmen and our subcommittee ranking members are equally as determined to serve their country by moving these appropriations bills along.

Senator STEVENS and I take the position that if Senators offer an amendment that puts us over the spending level, over the point where there have to be offsets, there will be offsets. The Senator from Alaska and I take a stand together. We will oppose amendments that add up to reckless spending. We don't have that in our committee. It is a fine example, and I am so proud of the service of Senator STEVENS. But our subcommittee chairmen and ranking members are just the same.

The Senator from Nevada is the chairman of the Energy and Water Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. He and Senator DOMENICI work together the same way in their subcommittee.

Mr. REID. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. REID. All 13 subcommittees, under the direction of Senators BYRD and STEVENS, made sure that we brought our bills out under the so-called 302(b) allocations, even though we didn't have them; isn't that true?

Mr. BYRD. Absolutely true.

Mr. REID. So all the Senate bills we passed were not budget busters; is that a fair statement?

Mr. BYRD. None of them were budget busters.

Mr. REID. If someone came to the floor and said: The reason we can't pass appropriations bills is because we haven't passed a budget, would it be a fair statement to say that is without basis in fact?

I should say, we don't have a budget, but as far as being the reason we don't do appropriations bills, that wouldn't be a very good reason, would it?

Mr. BYRD. No. We agreed in the committee that we would have a certain top line. We voted for that top line. It was unanimous, Republicans and Democrats there, and Republicans and Democrats in the Senate voted for that $768 billion top line. Yet the administration insists on standing by the $759 billion figure. That is just a $9 billion difference, just $9 billion. We are hung up over that $9 billion.

Ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the House. He knows what the problem is. He knows that the administration has its feet in concrete when it comes to that top line figure. He, the chairman on the House side of the Appropriations Committee, knows that we need that top line which we in the Senate have already agreed on, $768 billion, if we are to come close to meeting the needs of the American people, talking about homeland security also.

Mr. REID. What the Senator is saying is for the Defense appropriations bill, which was approximately $350 billion, you are saying the other 12 appropriations bills were $9 billion over what the Office of Management and Budget wanted; is that what the Senator is saying?

Mr. BYRD. I am saying that is the difference, $9 billion. That is all that is holding us from going forward. Yet Mr. Lawrence Lindsey, the President's economic adviser, says with respect to what the anticipated cost of the war in Iraq will be——

Mr. REID. Up to $200 billion.

Mr. BYRD. Somewhere between $100 billion and $200 billion, chicken feed. That is nothing, he says. That is nothing. Yet $9 billion is like a bone in the throat to this OMB Director down here, Mitch Daniels, and the President and the administration. They are hung up on $9 billion. But when it comes to Iraq, no; $100 billion, no, $200 billion, no.

Mr. REID. One last question to the Senator from West Virginia, if we passed all of our appropriations bills out of here, including the Defense bill, passed them and took them to the House, we still have to go to conference; is that not true?

Mr. BYRD. That is true.

Mr. REID. And maybe if the President made a good case in conference, we would come back with less than $9 billion over the OMB; is that right?

Mr. BYRD. Well, I suppose if there were a good case made. But the good case has already been made to the contrary that we need that $9 billion more.

Mr. REID. But my point is that the process has been going on for 215 years. The House does its work; the Senate does its work. We go to conference. There you work out differences. It is my understanding they are not letting us pass bills because they are not passing House bills that we can even go to conference.

Mr. BYRD. Absolutely. The House has not passed the appropriations bills. The House Appropriations Committee—no fault of the Republican chairman of that committee and others on the committee—has not passed, has not reported out all of the 13 bills in the House. The House has reported eight bills. The House Appropriations Committee has reported 8 of the 13 bills. I am just talking about the reporting out by the committee.

We haven't done very well over here, either, because we are stalled on the Interior appropriations bill which has been before the Senate now for many days.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I yield for a question.

Mr. DAYTON. From what I understand from the discussion, the Senate Appropriations Committee has come out on time and on budget, and yet we are hung up in these delays. The Senator who chairs that committee, who has done everything right in order to meet these deadlines, today is on the Senate floor expressing the catastrophic effects that will result across the country from the failure to meet these deadlines.

This Senator presides a great deal and has not heard anyone else come before the Senate to express his dismay at the human consequences of the failure to come to this agreement.

I thank the Senator for bringing these matters to the attention of the Senate and ask, as a final question: What can we do now to try to stave off these catastrophes?

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I hope the administration will come to its senses and stop playing politics. What I say, I say with great respect personally and individually to the leadership of the House, but for political reasons the House has not passed an appropriations bill—not a single one—in 9 weeks.

I have been in Congress now 50 years this year, and I don't recall, may I say to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania over here, ever in any administration, Democratic or Republican, seeing the likes of this. The House will not move its appropriations bills. The House is getting orders from on high—from on Mount Olympus, up there with the gods. So there we are. We are stalled, dead in the water. Here we are, within a few days of the new fiscal year.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business has expired.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. SANTORUM. Madam President, one quick comment about being stalled. I suggest that in defense of my colleagues in the House—and I try to be a defender of them in the Senate—I suspect one of the reasons is that we don't have a budget. It is very hard to mark up appropriations bills when you don't have an agreement between the two bodies. I think that is difficult.

The fact that the Senate has not passed a budget has put us in a situation where we have been unable to get conference reports—or even bills passed, in some cases—because of the uncertainty of what those numbers are.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SANTORUM. I yield for a question.

Mr. BYRD. I will try to put a question mark after it. The House has a bill. We, on this side, agreed on it, and we had a vote in the Senate not too long ago. We got 59 votes; we lack 1 vote, or we would have had a budget. I hope we have another opportunity to vote.

Mr. SANTORUM. Madam President, yes, the House does have a budget, but the Senate does not. The Senate's top line number is higher than the House's. That is why we go through the budget process, so that we can have agreement between the two bodies on the top line number, and we can apportion the money accordingly. There is a discrepancy between the two bodies. That is what creates the problem for the House in being able to move their appropriations bills—that trap into which they may be entering.

That is not the reason I got up to talk. I know the good Senator has spent considerable time talking about this, and I respect his opinion. I wanted to very politely disagree with some of the conclusions in his discussion.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I didn't know the Senator disagreed with me.

Mr. SANTORUM. With the conclusion. My mother always told me to try to disagree without being disagreeable. I am trying to do that at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Well, the Senator is talking about mothers now.

Mr. SANTORUM. I figure I am on solid ground in that regard.

Mr. BYRD. Maybe.

THE CARE ACT

Mr. SANTORUM. Madam President, I rise to talk about an issue of grave importance. The Presiding Officer is from New York, and she knows of the great tragedy that has befallen her State as a result of 9/11, and the tremendous generosity that has been pouring out to the victims of terrorism in New York, northern Virginia, as well as Pennsylvania.

What I am sure Members know also is that, as a result of that tremendous outpouring of giving, in a lot of other areas of the country charitable giving is actually off between 20 and 25 percent. Overall, charitable giving is up, but it has been channeled—legitimately so—toward the victims of terror.

As a result of that, and for other reasons, too, Senator LIEBERMAN and I have been working diligently with the President and our colleagues in the House to try to get a bill through the Congress this year because of its timeliness. It is a 2-year bill to try to get emergency help to faith-based organizations—but, frankly, if you read the legislation, to all nonprofit organizations that are out there trying to improve our society. This is a bill targeted at charitable organizations in an attempt to get more resources to them at a time when we have economic distress, wartime distress, as the war on terror goes on, and the distress coming from the terrorist attacks in the United States.

We are trying to respond in a compassionate way with resources to the very organizations that really do meet the human services needs. We are working in the Senate on a strong, bipartisan basis to try to find a consensus.

Now, this issue of the President's faith-based initiative has attracted a lot of controversy. Basically, it is centered around the issue of employment discrimination for those who would receive Federal dollars, whether they would be allowed to—because they are religious organizations—discriminate in employment.

Senator LIEBERMAN and I have attempted to build a bipartisan consensus to try to move a bill through the Senate and have chosen to set that issue aside, basically. Probably Senator LIEBERMAN and I have different views, and there are different views probably on both sides of the aisle. We thought this issue was so important, getting these resources at a time of economic need, at a time of war, to the nonprofit organizations was so important that, even though I believe this hiring discrimination language for nonprofit organizations is important, I was willing to set it aside. The President has agreed to set this aside in order to get bipartisan consensus to really work in the sort of bare bones, or the nuts and bolts, of what the President's initiative was about—getting help to charitable organizations, or to the "armies of compassion," as he terms it.

Senator LIEBERMAN and I came up with the CARE Act, and I thank Senators BAUCUS and GRASSLEY. It has moved through the Finance Committee and has broad bipartisan support. It has the Presiding Officer's support and also the majority leader's support. He has announced his support for the legislation. It is, I believe, from most people's perspective, a noncontroversial bill.

There are some who I understand have some concerns about the legislation. We have some on our side, and I understand there are some on the Democratic side of the aisle with specific provisions of the bill. Over the past several months, Senator LIEBERMAN and I have been working with our leadership and the Democratic leadership trying to clear this legislation so we can get the bill considered on the floor, with some sort of time agreement, because we are close to wrapping up the session, and with some limitation on amendments.

I would be perfectly willing to allow for two, three, four, five, or whatever amendments are necessary to meet objections on both sides of the aisle. Frankly, I don't see many objections, per se, to the bill, although I understand there are some. I also know there are people—because this is a tax bill—who would like to see a variety of tax issues considered on this bill. I am willing, if that is how we will reach a consensus, and I think Senator LIEBERMAN will be willing to debate those.

We have been informed by the majority leader that he does not want that debate. He would like to limit this to one amendment on each side with a relatively tight time agreement. That was a little bit of a heavy lift from our side of the aisle, but I proceeded, with the help of the rest of our leadership team, to work through our side of the aisle to get some amendments in the managers' package, and from that side of the aisle also. Yet we came down here with, yes, we can whittle it down.

In fact, last week we cleared a unanimous consent request for one amendment on our side—the one by Senator GRAMM from Texas, who has an amendment to a provision that isn't in the CARE Act, but it is in the package on the floor. Senator GRAMM would like to have an amendment. We submitted that to the Finance Committee 2 weeks ago and to the Democratic leader 2 weeks ago. They have been able to review that amendment. We have been working on a managers' amendment, and last week we were able to get a consensus. I thank Senators GRASSLEY and BAUCUS and their staffs for working diligently in trying to run through and get the consensus managers' amendment, which has been shared with my Republican colleagues.

It is a rather voluminous amendment, I might add. It is 200-some pages. That amendment was shared—and I thank the Finance Committee staff—with the Republican leader and with the minority Finance Committee members. We have that amendment. It is my understanding that amendment has been cleared on both sides.

We are at a point now where we have an amendment that has been available for 2 weeks on our side of the aisle. We have been able to hold off all other amendments, and I guarantee I have a long list of Senators who would like to offer amendments to this bill. But in the spirit of trying to pass what I believe is very important legislation—and I think most Members would agree getting help to charitable organizations during a time of economic stress and war is a good thing to do. It is a short period. It is not a long and permanent change to the Tax Code. It is a short period of infusion of resources into the charitable community. We now are at a place where we can try to move forward.

I know the Senator from Nevada, who is in the Chamber, the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from South Dakota, Mr. DASCHLE, have been trying to work on the Democratic side of the aisle to clear this amendment and this bill and try to get unanimous consent.

I will propound a unanimous consent request, and I am curious to hear the comments from the majority whip as to where we are in the state of play on the Democratic side of the aisle at this point. The reason I do so, I want to announce beforehand, is that last week when I came to the floor, having worked this now for several weeks, I said it is important we try to bring this issue to a head, and if we could not get a unanimous consent agreement offered by the leader that I would do so to attempt to provide to the Senate a better understanding of where this process stands and the likelihood for success in getting this done between now and the end of the session.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT REQUEST

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that at a time determined by the majority leader, after consultation with the Republican leader, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 496, H.R. 7, which is the House-passed President's faith-based initiative, and that it be considered under the following limitation: That there be 1 hour for general debate on the bill equally divided between the two managers; that the only amendment in order, other than a managers' substitute, be the following: One first-degree amendment offered by Senator REED of Rhode Island regarding charitable choice; and one first-degree amendment to be offered by Senator GRAMM of Texas regarding land/water sales or exchanges; that the amendments be limited to 60 minutes each to be divided between the proponents and opponents.

Finally, I ask unanimous consent that following the disposition of the above amendments and expiration of debate, the bill be read for a third time and the Senate proceed to a vote on passage of the bill, with no further intervening action or debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REID. Madam President, reserving the right to object, I think there is agreement by the vast majority of Senators on both sides of the aisle that this faith-based bill is important; that it is an important initiative we need to address. Fortunately, Senator LIEBERMAN, who has worked hand in hand with the Senator from Pennsylvania, is in the Chamber. I do not know of anyone better qualified to work on this issue than the Senator from Connecticut, who has devoted much of his life to issues such as this and sets an example on faith-based issues generally. We should listen to him, and certainly we will.

Senators LIEBERMAN and SANTORUM have crafted a bill that avoids many of the pitfalls some believe are contained in the House bill. As the Senator from Pennsylvania knows, we have also diligently worked to secure a unanimous consent agreement that would allow for consideration of this important legislation.

It is frustrating. We have not yet been able to work it out, but there is a lot of frustration on a lot of different issues in the Senate at this time.

We have been advised by a number of Senators, as late as this morning, that we need more time to work through some of the details of this unanimous consent request.

Again, I appreciate Senator SANTORUM's and Senator LIEBERMAN's commitment to this issue, but I object at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Madam President, if I may, objection has been heard, but I thank both my colleague from Pennsylvania and my colleague from Nevada for their statements. I share the frustration of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the disappointment with our inability to reach an agreement to allow for consideration of the CARE Act, which started out much broader. We have worked on it and really got it down to its essence and it is a good bill. It employs an expanding number of tax incentives to encourage charitable contributions.

The Senator from Pennsylvania said not just faith-based organizations but all charitable organizations. It is kind of a community-based or civic-based, nonprofit-based bill. It has the support of 22 cosponsors in the Senate. The occupant of the chair, the junior Senator from New York, is one of our original cosponsors. It is supported by the President, by the majority leader, Senator DASCHLE, as we said, and by 1,600—I repeat, 1,600—religious and community groups and social service providers, large and small, across the country.

We ought to pass this bill. It is one of the best bills we take up this year for not just faith-based groups but for our communities.

For reasons that are sometimes clear and sometimes not, some of our colleagues are holding up action on the CARE Act. Some who are objecting have not yet disclosed their identity. Given the fact that time is slipping away in this session, I appeal to my colleagues to not let this opportunity to help make our country as good as our values slip away, and let's particularly not squander the bipartisan consensus we have achieved on this method of transforming the good will in our country into more good work.

A lot of effort has gone into crafting this bill by people on both sides. I particularly thank Senator DASCHLE and his staff for the work they have done. Ideally, we can agree, as the Senator's unanimous consent proposal stated, to have one amendment on each side. Maybe we could agree on a couple more, if that is necessary. Let's have an open debate. Let's move the bill forward. Let's deliver this unique CARE package to its rightful destination, which is on the President's desk.

I hate to have Senator SANTORUM and me in a position where we start to look for a vehicle to which we can attach this as an amendment. We should not have to do that. I hope, working together, we can avoid that and get this legislation passed.

I thank my colleagues, and I yield the floor.

Mr. REID. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Oklahoma.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRESS

Mr. NICKLES. Madam President, I will make a couple of comments concerning the budget and the appropriations process. A couple of days ago we heard the majority leader being very critical of the President, talking about his lack of working with Congress and it is his fault we have a budget deficit. Earlier today, we heard the chairman of the Appropriations Committee being critical of the President. It looks like a lot of people are throwing rocks at the White House. Maybe that is the easy thing to do, but we should be looking internally and saying: What have we done?

We have not passed a budget, and because we have not passed a budget for the first time since the Budget Act was passed in 1974, we do not have a budget that has the same figures with the House. Every other year—and I have been in the Senate for 22 years—we have always had a budget.

Basically, the House and the Senate agree on numbers and then we pass appropriations bills. Every year we have been able to do that, except for this year. We have less than a week to go. Next Monday the fiscal year expires, and we have passed 3 out of 13 appropriations bills. That is probably the worst record in Senate history—certainly since the Budget Act passed. Shame on us.

And then to say it is the administration's fault or it is the House's fault—I heard somebody say it is the House's fault because the House has not passed very many. That is not our constitutional responsibility. Our responsibility is to pass our bills. We do not have to wait for the House. The tradition is, the Senate waits on the House, but we do not have to wait on the House. We certainly do not have to spend 4 weeks on the Interior appropriations bill.

This is our fourth week on the Interior appropriations bill. The Interior bill can, could, and should be done in 1, 2 or, at most, 3 days. It is ridiculous to think we have been on the bill for 4 weeks, and we still do not have an end in sight.

Some have said the Republicans are filibustering the bill. No Republican is filibustering the Interior bill and no Republican is filibustering the homeland security bill; none, not one. We have offered an amendment. I noticed the Democrats offered an amendment. They are entitled to offer amendments. We are entitled to have votes on those amendments. For some reason, the majority has come to this conclusion to file cloture.

Filing cloture on the Interior bill does nothing. Even if cloture was granted, it does not prohibit somebody from offering an amendment. They filed cloture on an amendment, not on the bill. So that process is going nowhere fast.

Now we have another cloture vote scheduled on homeland security, as if that is going to deny us having a chance to vote on the President's homeland security bill. That is not going to happen. It should not happen.

My compliments to Senator GRAMM and Senator MILLER. They have put together the President's package. They have made some modifications to try and accommodate Members. They are entitled to a vote. This idea of we are going to have cloture on the bill so they will not be able to offer their amendment is absurd, and it is not going to happen. So people can file all the cloture motions they want, but it does not move the process of the Senate.

We can move it. We can pass these bills. On the Interior bill, all someone has to do is move to table the amendment. Let's find out where the votes are. That is what we used to do. If the managers of the amendment do not like it, they can move to table it. They do not need to file cloture. They do not need a supermajority; just move to table it. It may well have the votes.

Certainly the President is entitled to have a vote on homeland security. It would be absurd to invoke cloture so that amendment would not be allowed. It brings home the fact the Senate is dysfunctioning; the Senate is not working. We had a very important energy bill. Did it go through committee? No. Did Senators who have experience and expertise in the energy issues get to mark up the bill? No. It came on the floor of the Senate. We spent 6 or 7 weeks working on marking up the bill on the Senate floor, and now it is in the conference. Hopefully, something will come out of that.

Did the Senate pass a prescription drug bill? No. Was it marked up in the Finance Committee? No. Did we have a markup? Did Members on the Finance Committee, some of whom have experience and expertise on prescription drugs and Medicare—every major Medicare expansion has passed through the Finance Committee in a bipartisan vote. We did not have a markup this year. We did not even have a chance to offer amendments. Yet we spent 2, 3, 4 weeks on the floor trying to mark up something on the floor with no result, with no prescription drug benefit being offered. The House was able to pass it. We were not.

The same thing is true for the Medicare give-back bill. The House was able to do that, in conjunction with the prescription drugs. Some are saying let's put together a give-back bill and run that through.

We are going to give providers, hospitals, and doctors more money, but we are not going to give prescription drugs to seniors who really need them, who do not have them, or who are maybe low-income? I am not sure that is very fair.

The Senate is flat not working.

In the Finance Committee last week, we are going to have a small business bill. Two or three Senators put together a bill, $16 billion. There are some tax increases. There was no consensus whatsoever in doing it, except maybe to help somebody politically, but it was not a question of, is this really going to stimulate small business?

Most people realize it is a stalking horse for a person to offer a minimum wage increase which really would hurt small business.

I look at the number of judges, and we have confirmed 78 judges. Some say that is great. In President Bush's first 2 years, 78 judges have been confirmed, which is 61 percent of the judges that he has nominated. Maybe that sounds pretty good, but in looking at President Clinton, he got 129 judges in his first 2 years. He got 90 percent of his judges; President Bush has 61 percent. President Bush 1 got 71 judges. That was 93 percent of the judges he nominated. President Reagan got 89 judges, which was 98 percent of the judges he nominated in his first 2 years, but President Bush only has 61 percent.

When it comes to circuit court judges, the President only has 14 of 32. He has 43 percent of his circuit court judges confirmed. For whatever reason, it seems as if the majority, the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee, do not want circuit court judges to be appointed by President Bush, so they are holding up several outstanding, well-qualified nominees, for ages.

Miguel Estrada is finally going to get a hearing on Thursday. He was nominated a year ago May. He has argued 15 cases before the Supreme Court. He has outstanding qualifications, graduated the top of his class from Columbia and Harvard, was an assistant U.S. attorney, and an assistant solicitor. He finally gets to have a hearing.

Then there is John Roberts who was nominated a year ago May. He has argued 35 cases before the Supreme Court, and he is yet to get a hearing, probably will not get a hearing this year. What is fair about that?

When people are patting themselves on the back because we have confirmed 78 judges and they are saying that is a lot, well, not when Bill Clinton got 90 percent and President Bush gets 61 percent; not when the current President Bush gets 43 percent of his circuit court judges and President Clinton got 86 percent. President Bush 1 and President Reagan both got 95 percent of their circuit court judges.

All of a sudden, when it comes to circuit court judges, we are just going to go slow on those; they are going to have to wait a year and a half to get a hearing, if they get a hearing. I do not think that is fair.

If we add together the fact that we have not done a budget, we have not done appropriations bills, we have not been confirming the number of judges that we traditionally have for the previous three Presidents, when we have not done a prescription drug bill, when we have not marked up an energy bill through the committee so it is stuck in conference, this Congress, this Senate, has not been working.

For people to say it is the President's fault or it is the House's fault, I disagree. The House has been pretty productive in their legislative efforts. They passed a prescription drug bill. They passed a budget. They have passed more appropriations bills than we have, and they would have passed more had we passed a budget. If this Senate would have passed a budget—which, incidentally, 60 votes are not needed to pass a budget. Fifty-one votes are needed to pass a budget. If this Senate would have passed a budget, these appropriations bills could have gone forward.

To cast aspersions blaming the House or the President for not getting the work done, the blame belongs right here. The Senate has not done its work. We have not passed a budget. We have not passed appropriations bills. Next Monday is the end of the fiscal year. Shame on us. This is the first year I have been in the Senate that we have not gotten our work even close to being done. It is not as though the bills are stuck in conference and we have not resolved the differences. We have not gotten the bills out of the Senate, and that is really not very acceptable.

The Senate needs to work. We need to do our work. We have not done our work, certainly this past year.

I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. CANTWELL). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. REID. Madam President, we have a number of Members on the minority side who wish to speak. The Senator from New Hampshire has been waiting for quite some time. He actually wants to offer an amendment on this bill. With the Gramm amendment pending, we would rather he didn't do that at this time. It is my understanding Senator DEWINE wishes to speak as in morning business.

Mr. DEWINE. Actually, it is on the bill.

Mr. REID. On the bill? You are not planning to offer an amendment or anything at this stage?

Mr. DEWINE. No, I am not offering an amendment.

Mr. REID. I see that the floor staff has returned. Could we have the ability to enter into an agreement at this stage?

Mr. GREGG. I suggest that I speak for 10 minutes with the understanding that no amendment be offered, and the Senator from Ohio be allowed to speak for 10 minutes with the understanding that no amendment will be offered.

Mr. REID. It is my understanding the Senator wishes more than 10 minutes.

Mr. GREGG. Twenty minutes?

Mr. DEWINE. Fifteen.

Mr. REID. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that—we don't have the agreement yet worked out—the Senator from New Hampshire be recognized for up to 10 minutes to speak as in morning business and that the Senator from Ohio—it doesn't matter, you can speak on the bill if you would rather. We are on the bill, so the Senator from New Hampshire will be allowed to speak for up to 10 minutes on the bill, and then the Senator from Ohio will be allowed to speak for up to 15 minutes on the bill. There would be no amendments offered by the two Senators, and following the statement of the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Nevada would be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOMELAND SECURITY ACT OF 2002—Continued

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the bill.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5005) to establish the Department of Homeland Security, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. GREGG. Madam President, I thank the leader for his courtesy in orchestrating this so I can speak briefly. I hope to offer an amendment, and I want to outline what the amendment is. I understand that the parliamentary situation, or the order of events, is that Senator GRAMM has the first amendment and, until that is worked out, this amendment will not necessarily be in order.

This amendment will address a very significant issue. It is a sense-of-the-Senate amendment dealing with the question of how we are dealing with the national policy on the smallpox vaccination.

As many people in America are probably aware, smallpox is probably one of the most virulent potential biological weapons that can be used anywhere in the world. It had, however, been significantly contracted in its availability. There were only two sites that actually possessed the actual smallpox germ; one was in Russia and the other was in the United States. Both of those were considered to be very secure. There is, however, concern that other individuals in the world may be trying to develop a smallpox strain, and if they are able to do that, the potential for devastating biological attack would be overwhelming.

I think it is important that people understand, as a preface to this issue, that, if a smallpox epidemic—or even a single incident of smallpox—breaks out anywhere in the world, it is reasonable to assume today that it is breaking out because there is somebody who has possession over the smallpox strain and is willing to use it in an aggressive, violent way and is willing to use it in a terrorist act. In other words, there is no way today you could have a natural breakout of smallpox anywhere in the world.

If, for instance, a single case of smallpox were found somewhere on the North American continent, one could immediately presume that terrorists had possession of the smallpox disease and were willing to spread it. That has a huge potential for loss of life.

Smallpox is a disease that spreads extremely quickly and is hard to control. How do we address this? Essentially, because we thought we had beaten smallpox as a disease, we didn't have in place a large stockpile of vaccination as a nation, or even across the world. There is very little stockpile of vaccine. We did have some stockpile and it was quite old—approximately 15 to 30 years old. It was a small amount. But after determination, it is now thought that even that small amount can be subdivided and we can produce maybe as much as 70 million doses.

We are in the process of developing, on the production side of the agenda in the U.S., with the pharmaceutical companies—and not only here but overseas—the capacity to bring online large amounts of dosage of smallpox vaccine. We expect that we will have enough dosage of smallpox vaccine within a relatively short time that, if we desire to do so, we could vaccinate every individual in our Nation.

Why don't we immediately do that and make that our national policy? The reason the decision has not been made to go forward to vaccinate the entire country is that there is a downside to the smallpox vaccine as it is presently developed; that is, approximately 1 percent of the people vaccinated, we know, will be significantly harmed and possibly even die. If you vaccinate 260 million people, you are looking at a significant death toll—in the hundreds, at a minimum—as a result of that vaccination regime. We know who those people usually are. They are usually people suffering from certain types of allergies, and we know they are people who are aged, infirm, or who have other weaknesses in their immune systems.

What has been the policy decision so far? The first policy decision, on which I greatly congratulate this Congress and the administration, was to put in place the regime so we could produce an adequate amount of vaccine. The second policy put forward as the concept of how we will address the smallpox breakout is that we will do a concentric circular event. In other words, we will surround the incident of smallpox with a vaccination of everybody in the area in an expanding circle. It is a pebble in a pool approach. If somebody threw a pebble in the small pond, it spreads outward. In the event of a smallpox outbreak, we are going to vaccinate everybody around the people infected, hopefully, containing the output. That is the plan as it is presently proposed. In addition, the plan is to vaccinate all first responders in the country.

What is the problem with that plan? It is very unlikely that our public health capability would allow us to vaccinate enough people fast enough to make the concentric circle approach be absolutely secure. We would probably experience an expansive medical emergency that would lead to a fairly significant loss of life should a single case of smallpox break out in the United States.

I am not saying it is not a reasonable approach, but it is an approach that probably has a significant likelihood that it will not be totally successful. We will have a significant success rate, but the success rate will be limited. Therefore, the loss of life will still be significant.

What is America to do? Basically, I think we can place confidence in our public health community that the vaccines are being developed and brought online. In addition, I believe we should, as a national policy, be willing to say to any American, once we have the smallpox vaccine in place, that in order to vaccinate the population generally—and it will be in place certainly by next June, and maybe earlier—we should be able to say to any citizen who feels strongly that they want to be vaccinated that you may be vaccinated.

In addition to the concentric circle approach, which I endorse, we should be able to say, if you are an American citizen, you have the right to go to your medical practitioner and ask them for a smallpox vaccination. If the physician determines you are not in an adverse category and that it is appropriate for you, thus, limiting the loss of life as a result of the 1 percent problem, then you ought to be able to get that vaccination.

That is what this sense of the Senate says. It says that, once we have obtained the necessary dosage level, which has been federalized, in order to vaccinate our population generally, then any American citizen will have the right to go to their physician and obtain that vaccine and be vaccinated.

It makes great sense to do this because, as a practical matter, it will first bring a calmness to the circumstance, which is important. Secondly, should there be an outbreak, it will obviously mean that a large percentage of America has been vaccinated already. Many people, I suspect, will take advantage of that option if it is out there.

Thirdly, I think it is good public health policy. I also think it should be done at no charge. I believe we, as a government, have an obligation to protect our citizens as a primary responsibility and, therefore, the Federal Government should pick up the cost of the vaccine as it is distributed.

So that is what this sense of the Senate says. It doesn't say that the concentric circle approach isn't good. It says, in addition to that, we should give all Americans, once we have obtained the vaccine capability that we know we are going to obtain, we should give them, in consultation with their physician, the opportunity to be vaccinated. I believe that is good health policy.

Certainly, as we proceed down the road and debate this homeland security bill, I intend to take the opportunity to offer this sense-of-the-Senate amendment.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON of Nebraska). The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. President, approximately 3 hours ago, the Senate passed the Lieberman-McCain amendment to create an independent national commission to investigate the events leading to and following the September 11 terrorist attacks. I voted in favor of that amendment. I come to the floor this afternoon to briefly explain why and explain what I hope that commission will do and what I hope it won't spend a lot of time doing.

I believe that commission should focus on what the joint Senate-House Intelligence Committee's investigation focused on in looking at the September 11 tragedy.

As a member of that committee, I have argued that we should be looking at not just what led up to September 11, not just finding out what the failures were, but also, and much more importantly, looking toward the future and trying to determine what we can do to change, what we can do to improve our intelligence operation, our intelligence network.

I believe that should be the same focus of the national commission. The national commission will inherit the work our joint committee has done. Shortly, we will be done with our work. The national commission will not only have our work, but it will have other information available to it. It will have the information that has been dug up by some very good reporters. It will have additional information, and so the foundation clearly will be laid.

The commission will not have to spend a lot of time rehashing the errors that were made. What I hope the commission will spend most of its time on, though, is the future. I would like to talk a little bit about that future this afternoon and what I think we need to do.

Knowing what failures have occurred in the past certainly is vital, but it is not enough. Knowing what we should do in the future is really what is important. The creation of this independent commission presents us with the opportunity to build on our current congressional intelligence investigation.

One of the reasons I did vote in favor of this commission is that I believe our Senate and House intelligence investigation stopped too early. We had a deadline. I thought the deadline was a mistake. I still think it is a mistake. Because we have that deadline, we have not been able to focus on the big picture issues of where we need to go in this country.

The language of the McCain-Lieberman amendment that was adopted this afternoon clearly provides the commission with the opportunity to get into these big picture issues.

I quote from that amendment. The amendment specifies the commission may

> . . . identify, review, and evaluate the lessons learned from the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, regarding the structure, coordination, management policies, and procedures of the Federal Government.

There is more to that. Those are words that I think are very important because those words, if this becomes law, will give this commission a great opportunity to look at these big picture issues about which I am talking.

What am I talking about? Let me give some examples. I believe the commission should take a serious look at the role of the Director of Central Intelligence. I believe it is time to give the DCI the necessary authority and the ability to truly direct our overall intelligence operations. Quite simply, we need to empower the DCI to do the job.

We all know the facts. Currently, the DCI, while he is in charge of our intelligence, only controls about 15 to 20 percent of the budget. This is an issue that has to be examined, and it has to be looked at, no matter how people come down on this issue. I know it is a contentious issue, and it may divide this Senate, it may divide the commission, but we need to look at it.

We had the opportunity in our joint committee the other day to hear from Sandy Berger, Anthony Lake, and Brent Scowcroft on a panel. All three of them said with various degrees of language that we need to make a change in the DCI, we need to make the DCI more powerful, we need to enable him to get the job done. That is an issue at which we should look.

Second, I believe we must seriously examine the long-term resource issues that confront us, not just now but over the long haul—over the next decade, maybe over the next two decades, or three decades. Are we providing the resources we need for our intelligence community? And are we providing them in the right way? Do they know they are going to have the necessary resources, as much as anybody can ever know year to year with Congress? But do they have some indication those resources are going to be there so they can get the job done? How much resources do they, in fact, need to protect us?

Maybe a good way of looking at it is to say, if tomorrow we were struck again and we are all in shock again, what would be our reaction? What would we do to the budget then? Maybe we need to ask ourselves that question and go ahead and do it now.

The next question I hope the commission looks at is: Do we have the human resources available within the agencies themselves? Are we going to get the necessary people because ultimately it comes down to people. We have good people. They are doing a good job. They are working 14, 15, 16 hours a day, but there is only so much they can do. How many more people do we need? My guess is we need a lot more people based on what I have seen. In the counterterrorism center, for example, in the CIA, FBI, we need a lot more people.

Do we have the right technology is another question the commission should look at, and do we have enough of it to get the job done in the new world in which we live? The technology the FBI has is not good. If any major business in this country had that technology, somebody would be fired; a lot of people would be fired. It is shameful. It is wrong. It is not fair to the employees, and it is not fair to the American people. We are, frankly, responsible for that. We are responsible for that failure. We have an obligation to change that. That is another issue at which this commission should look.

The commission should ask us and the American people: What is our long-term commitment to intelligence?

Finally, I think the commission needs to examine the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the FISA statute, and determine what changes are necessary to make sure we are getting intelligence from this source to help prevent future attacks. We made improvements in FISA. The Patriot Act was an improvement. Quite frankly, Congress has been derelict in its duty over two decades to have good oversight over FISA. It has been a hidden court, as it was designed to be; a secret court, as it was designed to be. Yet we have not figured out some way through the Intelligence Committees to have good oversight to find out how the law we wrote as representatives of the American people is truly being interpreted.

For the first time we have a court decision that has come out of the FISA court. It is not public, but we can at least look at it. It is the first one, to my knowledge, that has been published in 2 decades. I do not happen to agree with the decision, but we can look at it. It is being appealed. We will have an opportunity to see what the court of appeals says about that, but at least that part of the debate is out there.

We must continue to look for ways to fulfill our oversight responsibility in the Congress. That is an issue that the commission should look at as well.

These are a few of the issues I think the commission needs to look at. Let me say, however, it is not just the commission's responsibility. I voted for this amendment, not because I felt it would be solely the commission's responsibility to look at these issues; I believe the Senate Intelligence Committee has an obligation to look at these big-picture issues in the months and years ahead. I believe the House has the same obligation. I simply believed that with an additional commission issuing reports in 6 months, 12 months, 18 months, that would be an added voice, an added set of eyes, more expertise, to look at some of these issues this country should be debating.

Ultimately, we need a serious national debate about all of these issues and so many more, even those that are outside the realm of the intelligence community. In examining the intelligence component, if we have learned anything from September 11, it is that our security, our safety, and the safety of our loved ones, is intrinsically linked to the quality of that intelligence. So we must do all we can to improve the quality of that intelligence. The ability to share that information with the appropriate agencies is involved with our national security. As Members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, as Members of this Senate, we have an obligation to examine these issues. We must debate them. The proposed commission can certainly play a productive role in these debates and in these investigations. Therefore, I was pleased this afternoon to support its creation.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. I ask unanimous consent that following the cloture vote on the Lieberman amendment tomorrow, if cloture is not invoked, the Senate remain on the homeland defense bill and Senator GRAMM of Texas be recognized to offer an amendment; that there be two hours of debate equally divided between Senators GRAMM and LIEBERMAN or their designees; that at the conclusion of that time the amendment continue to be debatable and Senator DASCHLE or his designee be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, the amendment we have been waiting for for some time will be offered in the morning, or as soon as the vote is completed, as the unanimous consent request indicated.

It appears the two managers have some amendments they can clear on this homeland security bill. That being the case, we will stay on the bill. When the amendments are cleared, we will go to a period for morning business until Senators have said all they wish to say, and then we will recess until tomorrow. We hope this is the beginning of the end of this bill. I think we have made progress to get to this point. As I have indicated, we have been trying to get this amendment now for about the second week, so finally we are there. This is a big amendment. We will determine how it is going to be disposed of sometime tomorrow.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. REID. Mr. President, Senator DORGAN is here and wishes to speak as if in morning business. I ask unanimous consent that he be recognized for up to 20 minutes, and that following his statement, we return to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from North Dakota.

TERRORISM AND THE ECONOMY

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. President, I would like to speak about several important issues facing the Senate at the moment: namely, the situation with Iraq, and the state of our economy.

First, let me speak about Iraq. And let me begin by saying that I don't think there is any question that Saddam Hussein is not following the terms of surrender at the end of the gulf war. He has failed to live up to any one of those terms or conditions.

I was at the Incirlik Base in Turkey and visited with the pilots who are flying over the northern area of Iraq enforcing the no-fly zone. These pilots fly in harm's way. They are often shot at by the ground forces of the Iraqi Army. The fact is, Saddam Hussein has violated virtually everything to which he previously agreed.

I don't think there is any question that this is a bad person, who poses a real threat. He wants access to nuclear weapons. He has access, apparently, to chemical and biological weapons. And the President says we ought to do something about this threat posed by Saddam Hussein. I agree that we should. The question is, How?

The President went to the United Nations. And I think that was the right thing to do. The Secretary of State is now asking the Security Council to join us and pass another enforcement resolution so we can, with other countries, begin to enforce coercive inspections in Iraq to make sure that, if they have weapons of mass destruction, they are destroyed, and to make sure they are never able to acquire weapons of mass destruction, especially nuclear weapons.

But there are other avenues that we should also pursue. I have thought for 10 years, since the end of the gulf war, that this country should press for the formation of an international criminal tribunal at the United Nations to indict and try Saddam Hussein as a war criminal.

I don't know whether at the end of the day there is going to be a regime change in Iraq or not. I hope there is. I believe there ought to be a regime change, but I am not sure whether that is going to happen. If it doesn't happen, I still think we ought to push for the creation of an international war crimes tribunal, so that Saddam Hussein is indicted and convicted.

There is ample evidence—both in this country and also in the United Nations—to indict and convict this man of war crimes.

I spoke on the floor some years ago about a young boy and his family who lay dead on the ground in Iraq—victims of weapons of mass destruction unleashed by Saddam Hussein that killed thousands of those people. He is the only leader I know of in this world who has used weapons of mass destruction against his own citizens. So there is ample evidence for that and other reasons to indict, try, and convict Saddam Hussein for crimes against humanity.

I have never understood the reluctance of this Government to push ahead to do that. I have never understood that. Senator SPECTER from Pennsylvania and I offered a resolution—I think it was about 5 years ago in the Senate—calling on the State Department to go to the United Nations and attempt to get a war crimes tribunal so we could indict, try, and convict this man as a convicted war criminal. I think whenever we talk about Saddam Hussein, we should be talking about a convicted war criminal.

Had we done what we should have done 10 years ago and 5 years ago, that is what we would now call him, because the evidence is so substantial about what he has done to his own people, to people in the region, to his neighbors, the weapons he has used—there is just no question that this man, even in absentia, would be tried and found guilty as a war criminal.

I think even today our State Department should press that case, even as we are pressing for coercive inspections and contemplating taking action again against the country of Iraq.

I have asked my staff to talk to the staff of the Senator from Pennsylvania about offering that resolution once again in the Senate. It passed the Senate 4 or 5 years ago without a dissenting vote. Yet nothing has happened with respect to Saddam Hussein and Iraq and the creation of a war crimes tribunal at the United Nations to indict and to try him.

Let me turn to the economy for a moment. Because while the Iraq issue is vitally important, we have other very big challenges that are largely being ignored. The President and some in this Chamber don't want to talk about this, but the fact is our economy is in some significant trouble. We have some people whose responsibility it is to be involved in fiscal policy who say: What trouble? Things are going just fine. This is just a little bit of a correction. Things will be fine. Just wait and do nothing. Things will work their way out.

The fact is, we have come to an intersection in this country unlike any we have ever arrived at before. Just a year and a half ago, President Bush proposed a fiscal policy. He came to office, and said: What I see in this country is 10 years of surpluses, and big ones at that. That money belongs to the taxpayer. Let us give it back. Let us have a $1.7 billion tax cut.

I did not vote for that because I said I thought we ought to be a little more conservative. I don't think we can see 3 months ahead, let alone 10 years ahead. I think the conservative thing to do would be to attempt to be a little more moderate in how we deal with fiscal policy and not lock in a $1.7 billion reduction in revenue.

I lost that argument. The majority in this Chamber and the other Chamber voted for a $1.7 billion tax cut over 10 years. The President celebrated and his supporters celebrated. Everyone talked about how wonderful that was. Mr. Greenspan, down at the Federal Reserve Board, thought that was fine, too.

It wasn't very much past that—some months past that—when we discovered the country was in a recession. If we had been in a recession at the time we were talking about these expected 10 years of surpluses, would we have made a different decision? Maybe.

Not much more than a couple of months beyond that we had the terrorist attacks against our country on September 11. Had we known we were going to face a recession and the terrorist attacks on our country on September 11 that caused such a devastating loss of life, would we have said let us put in place a $1.7 billion tax cut? I think we might have made different decisions.

Then, on top of that, we had the technology bubble burst and the stock market began to act like a yo-yo with more down than up.

On top of all that, we had the corporate scandals in which we saw some of the largest corporations in this country—Enron, to name one. I chaired the hearings in the Commerce Committee investigating Enron. We saw the executives of that company and others run these companies into the ground. They cheated and lied to the investors and to the employees. The board of directors finally had their own investigation into their own company. Do you know what they said? They said: What we found inside our company was "appalling." They said: We found this corporation was reporting $1 billion in earnings that it didn't earn.

To give a small example of what was going on, the chief financial officer of that corporation invested $25,000 of his own money into a corporation, a partnership—a corporation in which he had a proprietary interest—and he took out $4.5 million 60 days later.

Let me say that again.

He invested $25,000 of his own money and then took out $4.5 million 60 days later.

I come from a town of 300 people. We call that stealing in my hometown.

In corporation after corporation, we see all of these corporations and the books being recalculated and company executives being led away in handcuffs.

There are a lot of great companies in this country, and a lot of great CEOs. Make no mistake about that. Some people say it is just a few bad apples. That is true. How big is the orchard with bad apples?

It is just too many corporations, too many accounting firms, and too many law firms that are the enablers that allowed all of this to happen and too many executives with larceny in their hearts who don't understand this wasn't their money. This was the investors' money.

What you have is an intersection of a recession, a terrorist attack, corporate scandal, the tech bubble bursting, and the stock market collapsing.

Yet, the Administration is telling us that they don't even want to talk about the economy, as if the circumstances had not changed at all.

When people sit around a supper table and talk about their lives, most families talk about some key things. Do we have good jobs? Do our jobs pay well? Do we have job security? Do our kids go to good schools? Do grandpa and grandma have access to good health care? Do we live in a safe neighborhood? Those are all the questions that affect the lives of America's families.

Do we have job security? Let me give you an example. A fellow wrote to me. He said: My life savings as an employee of the Enron Corporation—he worked for a pipeline corporation that was a subsidiary—were in Enron stock. It was worth $330,000. I saved for years to put together $330,000 in my 401(k) account in Enron stock. It is all that I have. That $330,000 is now worth $1,700.

Is that a problem? You bet your life it is a problem for that family, and so many other families across this country who have seen their life savings dissipate.

Now, people say: Well, that is just anecdotal information about this family or that family. But it is not that. The average 401(k) account in this country has lost one-third of its value. These are the life savings of people, the retirement savings of people. It has lost one-third of its value.

Do you think that is going to have an impact on our economy? Of course it is. Our economy is all about people's expectations about the future.

I used to teach economics. I overcame that, nonetheless, and have been able to go on and do some other things productively. The field of economics is not much more than psychology pumped up by helium. It is just people estimating what might or might not happen.

Our economy is very simple. If our future is a bright, rosy future, if people are confident about the future, then they do things that manifest that confidence. They buy a house, buy a car, take a trip; they do the things that represent people who are confident in their future. And that expands the economy.

When people lack confidence in the future, they do the exact opposite. They decide not to take the trip. They don't buy the car. They don't buy the house. They defer purchases they might have otherwise made. As a result, economy contracts.

So we are in a situation where we have an economy that is in some trouble. It is not growing. People are not confident about the future. They see corporate scandals. They are worried about investing in a corporation. They are worried about the method by which we ask people to invest in a share of stock in a company they never visited with executives they don't know, with accounting firms they are supposed to trust but now do not.

And still we have the Administration and some in the Senate saying: Well, what is the problem? We don't need to revisit any of these circumstances. We don't need to talk about fiscal policy. We don't need to talk about the economy.

They are wrong. We need to talk about jobs. What is happening in jobs? We need to talk about the economy, economic growth, and opportunity. We need to talk about this country's fiscal responsibility, its budget mess.

There isn't anyone in this Chamber who can get up and talk about how this budget adds up, because it does not. We have a fiscal policy that is sorely out of balance, and everybody knows it. Everyone wants to pretend that is not the case. And it starts with the President.

Now, what is the record?

Job losses. We are not expanding. We are losing jobs at this point. Private-sector jobs are down, down sharply.

Weak economic growth. In fact, some indicators suggest we may have almost no growth at the present time.

We have an anemic economy, there is no question about that.

Declining business investment.

A falling stock market. Just take a check over the last week or two; in fact, go back 6 years to find when the NASDAQ was as low as it was yesterday.

Shrinking retirement accounts. I have just described that. An average family having a 401(k) is losing a third of its value.

Eroding consumer confidence.

Rising health care costs. One of the issues we ought to talk about on the floor of the Senate is this: rising health care costs. It also explodes the Federal deficit, causes havoc with every State budget, especially causes chaos with the budgets of families.

We are trying to say to the American people and the pharmaceutical industry: The prices you are charging for prescription drugs are outrageous. You charge the American people the highest prices in the world for prescription drugs, and it is unfair.

Yet, when you take on that industry in this Chamber, asking, "how do you justify this; how do you justify to a woman who has breast cancer that the drug Tamoxifin is going to cost her 10 times as much in the United States as you charge for the identical drug in Canada; how do you justify that," there is no answer. It is a deafening silence.

But yet you can't get effective legislation through the Congress because we have too many here who support the pharmaceutical industry. The big, powerful, and strong make a great deal of money, and they like the status quo.

We are going to focus on an economic forum of sorts in the coming couple of weeks, to see if we can get together people who want to talk about the economy who have contrasting views about the economy, and to see if we can begin a debate about what ought to be done.

We have too many people out of work. We have too many people who have lost too much money in the market. We have an erosion of confidence. We have a budget deficit that is escalating.

We could not get appropriations bills through the floor of the Senate by the October first date. Why? We could not get a budget? Why? Because none of it adds up. And everyone in this Chamber knows it does not add up.

How do you add up a circumstance where you have less revenue coming in, and you decide you have to do $45 billion more for defense in 1 year, probably something close to $30 billion more for homeland security in 1 year? Add that additional spending on top of a fiscal policy in which you have either slow growth or a recession, and less money coming in, and therefore higher deficits, and then what is left for the things that represent domestic discretionary spending, including health care and education?

What is left to try to do something that says to kids: Your education matters because our future is in our schoolrooms? We believe that every young child ought to walk through the door of a schoolroom where their parents are able to say: We have sent our child to the best schoolroom in the world.

How do you do that when there is no money left for education or health care because we have a fiscal policy that does not add up because 18 months ago we said we were going to have surpluses for 10 straight years, and 18 months later—following a war, a recession, stock market collapse, corporate scandals, and more—we now have turned surpluses into big deficits.

I think it is time—long past the time—for this Congress to have an honest, real, aggressive, significant debate about this country's economy: what is wrong; how do we fix it; what has worked; what works; what is right; what does not work, and how do we repair it.

I began by talking about Iraq. The situation in Iraq is very important. But our economy is also vitally important. We have been the economic engine for this world. When the economy in Asia was soft, we still were the economic engine that provided strength. When the economies of Europe were soft, the American economy was still the economic engine. Take a look what is happening to the American economy today, and it is not working well.

This Congress has a responsibility to begin a thoughtful, sober, serious discussion about what works and what does not with our economy, and how we construct a new fiscal policy to fix that which is wrong. The President has a responsibility to join us as well. At the present time he talks only about foreign policy. Foreign policy is important, but it is not exclusive. This President has a responsibility to join us. It is his fiscal policy. He won 18 months ago. It is his fiscal policy that now helps create large deficits rather than large surpluses. He must join us in trying to determine what we can do to pull ourselves out of this morass.

This country can do better, but it needs good public policy coming from this Congress.

I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I come to the floor at the end of the day to remind our colleagues that there will be two votes tomorrow morning. They will both be cloture votes. Those votes are ones we have cast before. This will be the third cloture vote on the drought and firefighting amendment that has been pending for weeks. It will be the second vote on homeland security.

I am troubled by the rhetoric I hear off the floor with regard to Democratic efforts to slow this legislation down. I find it quite ironic that while there are some who suggest it is Democrats holding up this legislation and criticize us for doing so, it is the Democrats voting virtually with unanimity in support of cloture to end debate on both bills.

This is the fourth week we will be on this legislation.

I don't know what agendas are being played out. Some may think maybe the longer we wait to vote on these things, the more advantageous it is for one side or the other. There is a lot of work left to be done. I know the American people expect us to complete our work on homeland defense, and our farmers and ranchers and firefighters certainly expect us to have acted by now on the assistance they need so desperately.

How cynical can it be for some to suggest, in the name of whatever, that we can hold up drought assistance, hold up firefighting assistance, hold up the extraordinary help this represents, in the name of whatever issue? I have said this before on the Senate floor, and I will say it again now. Just getting cloture on the Byrd amendment, which includes $5 billion or more in drought assistance, and almost a billion dollars in firefighter assistance—to get cloture on that amendment in no way precludes other amendments. It certainly doesn't preclude any Senator from offering the forest health amendment or anything else on the bill itself. It doesn't preclude that.

So there is absolutely no reason Senators should oppose cloture on the drought and firefighters amendment—unless they are not serious about providing help in the first place. You have to wonder, after the third cloture vote, if people are truly serious about providing help; if they are serious when they say they want to provide some response to firefighters and drought victims in the agricultural areas of our country.

You would have to believe if they were serious they would vote for cloture, they would send this amendment and this bill into conference, and we would get this job done. You would think that.

All of the machinations and explanations and all of the excuses ring very hollow to ranchers and farmers and firefighters when they note that we are now in the third week of this filibuster from the other side, depriving these very people the sustenance they need to survive.

Mr. President, there can be no explanation. So I hope the vote tomorrow will have a different result. I hope all these political strategies, as they play themselves out, have played their course. I hope we can say, on a bipartisan basis, that the time has come for us to send a clear message to ranchers and farmers and firefighters that we are going to get them that help. I hope we can do that.

Tomorrow is our chance because I will tell you if we don't get cloture tomorrow, we send just the opposite message—that in politics we can say anything we want and not be held accountable. We can say we are for you, but we can always think of a reason we are not at the end of the day.

There is a great deal of cynicism in ranch and farm country and the forests as we fight these fires right now. People are shaking their heads wondering what in Heaven's name could be holding up this help. I cannot explain it, and I don't think anybody else can satisfactorily. They can come to the floor and say they are not filibustering. They can come to the floor and say there are other issues that are more important. They can come to the floor and try to explain in a hundred different ways, but there is no explanation. There is no excuse. There is no way to look in the eyes of those farmers and ranchers or firefighters and say: Just wait another week, wait another month. You have waited long enough, but we are going to make you wait a little longer.

You cannot do that.

So tomorrow is a big test. Are we serious about drought assistance? Are we serious about firefighter assistance? Are we serious about getting this job done and sending the right message? We will know the answer by late morning.

The same could be said about homeland security. As I noted, we have already had one cloture vote. I am told the amendment offered by our Republican friends is germane. So there really is no reason to vote for cloture and bring this bill to a close. We have so much more work to be done. A day doesn't go by when three or four colleagues on both sides of the aisle come to me and say: When are we getting out? When are we going to be able to go home?

The answer to that rests, in part, on tomorrow. If we can support cloture and get this legislation passed, if we can move this agenda forward, with all the other things that have to be done, there is no reason we cannot meet our adjournment day.

Mr. President, I just come to the floor to urge my colleagues not to fall into the trap—the rhetoric trap—of attempting to explain why you are for homeland security, why you are for drought assistance, why you are for firefighting assistance, why you are for completing our work on time—and then turning around and voting against cloture, voting against bringing this debate to a close, after a month of legislative activity on the Senate floor.

I will be watching. I know the American people will be watching. Tomorrow is a very big day. Tomorrow is a day when we will see who is sincere and who is not; who is prepared to bring help to those needy farmers and ranchers and firefighters, and who is not; who is prepared to answer the President who said just yesterday that the Senate needs to get its act together to pass homeland security. Tomorrow is our chance.

So let's see whether we seize the moment and take that chance and do what we need to do to get the job done. I am sure on both sides of the aisle colleagues recognize the importance of doing just that. So we will have a chance to prove it tomorrow morning on the cloture vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAYTON). The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, to respond to the majority leader, I totally disagree with many of the statements that were made. There is no one on this side of the aisle filibustering the Interior or homeland security bills. No one. None. I know. We are willing to vote. I am embarrassed that we have spent 3 weeks on the Interior bill. Cloture is not filed on the Interior bill; cloture is filed on one amendment. Even if cloture was invoked, the amendments can still be offered. Senators have a right to offer amendments. I just mention that.

If the majority leader wants to move forward on the bill, table the amendment. That is the way to do it. I know the majority leader knows that. I will table the amendment if that will help him. If I was managing the bill, I would try to move the bill. I used to be chairman of that subcommittee. It is embarrassing to me that the Senate has been on this and homeland security for now the fourth week. That is not the way to manage appropriations bills. I am embarrassed we haven't passed but three appropriations bills. I just mention that to my colleague.

Having a cloture vote on the Interior bill is a total waste of time. Even if it is invoked, you can waste 3 days, and then the sponsors of the amendment can still offer the amendment to the bill. That is correct. Cloture on homeland security is a waste of time. I tell the majority leader that because it would deny the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Georgia the chance to offer the President's substitute. I know the leader knows we have enough votes to make sure they know they are going to get enough votes on the substitute.

There is a tendency around here to file cloture thinking that will always expedite matters, but certainly it is not the case with the appropriations bills. It will not work, I am informing the majority leader.

I am also saying, with regard to filing a cloture motion on homeland security, we are not going to let that deny the President the opportunity to offer his proposal. We can have all the cloture votes you want, but it does not move us any quicker to passing drought relief or additional money for firemen. It will not happen.

If you want to dispose of that amendment, we can table it and find out where the votes are. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to have a vote on his amendment. There is money in it for fire. He is saying we should reform our processes in managing the forests. He has a right to do that.

I know Senator REID and I have managed bills in the past. Senators have offered amendments, and the ones we did not like, we would usually table, and if we were not successful, we would usually drop it in conference, but we would manage the bill. This bill is not being managed. Neither bill is being managed. So we are now on our fourth week on two bills when both should have been done in a relatively short period of time.

I mention that to the majority leader. File all the cloture motions you want, but if you want to move forward on the bill, I think we should just vote on these amendments and we can be done.

I mention that as friendly advice. I would like to see the Senate work and see the Senate work much better, but I did want to clarify—I have said this about four times—no one on the Republican side of the aisle is filibustering either of these two bills.

I think it is in our best interest for the Senate and for the Congress to pass both bills. I am willing to work with the majority leader to do that. I offer a suggestion: If people do not like the Craig amendment, move to table it or come up with an alternative where we vote side by side on different alternatives.

I had understood there was going to be a motion to table the Craig amendment, and then there was going to be a Bingaman amendment which is comparable. Ways can be worked out. Senator CRAIG is entitled to a vote on his amendment, and Senator BINGAMAN may be entitled to a vote on his amendment. We can dispose of that, finish the Interior bill, get it to conference, and hopefully work it out with the House.

I also hope we can do that with the remainder of the other appropriations bills. It is embarrassing for me not to have passed more appropriations bills through the Senate, through the House, and to the President. He is entitled to have an opportunity to sign or veto appropriations bills, and we are not giving that to him.

I make those comments and friendly suggestions to my friend. I do want to reemphasize that no one on the Republican side is filibustering either of these bills. I wanted to make sure that is clear. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, as always, I appreciate the friendly advice from my friend and colleague, the Senator from Oklahoma. He is a student of the legislative process. He has every right to be embarrassed. If he wants to come to the floor to express how embarrassed he is, I certainly would not want to keep him from doing that, and I appreciate his candor.

As to the appropriations bills, the House has sent us five. This is the fourth one that we have taken up. There are eight bills that are mired, that are languishing in the House of Representatives because the House Republican leadership cannot appear to find whatever wherewithal may be required to move the legislation forward. They have not sent them to the Senate so, obviously, we cannot bring them up. We are waiting patiently for additional legislative action on the part of the House. I am hopeful they will send it soon because they are the ones who should be embarrassed.

I must say the Senator from Oklahoma is certainly within his rights to express himself and in characterizing these votes against cloture in any way he sees fit. That is the right of every Senator. I do not blame him for not wanting to be accused of filibustering this legislation, but I think anyone, just an objective observer would be hard pressed to say: We are not filibustering, but we are going to vote against cloture.

What is cloture? Cloture is the means by which you bring an end to the debate on a particular bill or an amendment. That is what cloture is. I can read the rule. I can clearly, I am sure, share with my colleagues exactly what the rule says with regard to how one ends a filibuster, how one ends extended debate. How do you do that? You file cloture.

When our Republican colleagues were in the majority, they used to fill the tree. They used to load up the amendment tree and then file cloture so that not only would they end debate, they would keep it from beginning. We would not even start the debate when our colleagues would come to the floor and not end it but prevent it.

I have said I will not do that. We will have debates, but there comes a time, and I would say any objective observer would say at the end of 4 weeks, that is a pretty good time. I mean, just to pick a number—4 weeks of debate. We file cloture now for the third time on the Interior appropriations bill to end debate. That is what it will say tomorrow morning.

We will support it. Our colleagues are going to oppose it, and then they are going to say: But we are not against ending debate; we are not filibustering.

If you can convince anybody of that, you are a better speaker and a more persuasive person than I am. Bless your heart if you can do that. I am telling you, this is a filibuster, purely, simply, and without question. You vote against cloture for the third time, you vote to filibuster; you vote not to end debate; you vote to extend, and the bottom line is—forget all the parliamentary procedural gobbledygook—you are telling ranchers, and farmers, and firefighters they are going to wait a lot longer. That is what you are telling them.

Forget the filibuster. Just remember what it means to extend debate in this case. It means they wait longer. It means that regardless of whatever excuses you can come up with, you continue to deny these people the chance to get help. That is what it means, pure and simple. They understand that in South Dakota. I think they even understand that in Oklahoma. But regardless of whether they understand it in Washington, we will have the chance once more to demonstrate who is for getting that help and who is not. That is what that vote is tomorrow. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assistant Republican leader.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I compliment my colleague from South Dakota because he got his people some help. He was able to pass an amendment that would allow them to clean up their forests and maybe prevent forest fires, but the rest of the people in the country did not get the so-called Daschle amendment. He was able to get it. I do not know how. It went through. We did not have a vote on it. We did not have a lot of discussion because a lot of us would have said it should have been national. So Senator CRAIG offered an amendment that said we want part of the reforms—not all the reforms—Senator DASCHLE was successful in getting to help South Dakota.

We are saying, in forest management, because we have forest fires breaking out all across the country, we should be able to clean up some of the diseased and dead trees so we do not have kindling for further fires. That is the essence of the Craig amendment.

We are entitled to a vote on that amendment. We did not get to vote on Senator DASCHLE's amendment. We did not get a vote on that. We are not even saying we should have that policy nationally, but we should have part of it to reduce the cause and incidents of forest fires.

In the underlying bill, we have money for forest fires, and we have money for drought. Senator CRAIG says: Let's have improvement in forest management simultaneously. He has a right to offer that amendment. Cloture, as Senator DASCHLE is trying to invoke, would make it impossible for Senator CRAIG to offer that amendment on the firefighting money.

Interestingly enough, it would not prevent him from offering it to the rest of the bill. Senator DASCHLE is not offering cloture on the bill. He is offering it on one amendment. I am tempted to say we agree to cloture; that would be fine with me. And then Senator CRAIG can offer the amendment to the bill. So cloture is getting us nowhere fast. We do not need this.

I implore the majority leader: Let the Senate work. If you do not want the Craig amendment to pass, move to table it, and we move on. You roll with the punches. You win some, you lose some.

Evidently, some people on the Democratic side of the aisle do not want to vote on the Craig amendment. I hope people understand that is what it is about. I am protecting the right of the minority to offer an amendment.

I tell the majority, we are going to offer this amendment. Whether it is an amendment to Senator BYRD's amendment or someplace else on the bill, we are going to offer the amendment. We are not going to be denied the opportunity to offer an amendment. I have to protect my Members' rights, and I will do so aggressively.

So I urge the majority leader to withdraw the cloture vote. If he wants to have cloture, he is not going to get it. We are going to insist on the right to offer amendments.

The same thing would apply to homeland security. If cloture is invoked, then we do not even get to have a vote on the President's homeland security bill.

Senator GRAMM and Senator MILLER have a bipartisan bill, which the President has worked on. They have agreed upon it, they have adjusted it, they have worked on it, and they are entitled to offer their amendment. If cloture is invoked on homeland security, they do not even get to offer that amendment. So cloture is a tool not just to shut off the debate, it is a tool used to deny Members the right to offer their amendments.

This is the fourth week we have been on these two bills, and we have made very little progress. We have had very few votes because people do not want to vote? This side is willing to vote. We have been willing to vote on the Craig amendment for weeks. Let's vote. The way to bring a vote to a head if you cannot get somebody on this side ready to vote and that side is not ready to vote, you move to table it. That is a nondebatable motion. You get a vote. Let's find out where the votes are.

If somebody does not want to vote, why are they in the Senate? We are delaying one bill for weeks because some people do not want to vote on one amendment. It is ridiculous. We used to manage these bills in ways that if a Senator did not like the amendment and got beat on the floor, he might drop it in conference, or try and change it. But to just say we are going to keep filing cloture, as if that is trying to bring a filibuster, there is no filibuster. If there is a filibuster, it is on the Democrat side; it is not on the Republican side. We are ready to vote. I have heard the sponsors of this amendment say we are ready to vote, we are ready to vote. So to say this is going to risk drought assistance and fire assistance does not fly. We are ready to vote. Let's vote up or down on the amendment. Let's vote today. Let's vote tomorrow. Let's vote the next day. How many weeks do we need to be on it?

I am ready to win. I am ready to lose. We are exhausted on the debate, but we keep having it. This is about the fifth debate I have given, not on the substance but on cloture, because the majority keeps filing cloture. They are going to keep filing cloture. Why? It is to no avail.

We are not going to get cloture and deny Senator GRAMM and Senator MILLER the opportunity to offer the President's substitute or the President's proposal for national homeland security. That is not going to work. Everybody knows that. It is not going to work.

Why in the world would we adopt cloture and deny Senator CRAIG the amendment dealing with forest fire management? Senator DASCHLE was able to get in a management proposal that dealt with his forests. My compliments to him. I like people taking care of their States. I like people doing forest management in their States, working out agreements with environmentalists. Evidently, that happened in Senator DASCHLE's case so they can harvest some timber and get rid of some of the dead timber. That is great. Why can we not do that for the rest of the country? Are we not entitled to offer that amendment?

I believe Senator CRAIG's amendment is scaled down in comparison to what Senator DASCHLE was able to do in South Dakota. My compliments to Senator DASCHLE for helping his State, but I think other people are entitled to offer amendments that would protect their States. Their States are burning. Their States are not just asking us to give them more money for fire assistance, but they want to change the policy so we do not have so many fires next year and the next year.

They are entitled to offer that amendment, and if people disagree with that amendment, they are entitled to vote against it or they are entitled to table it. But to file what I think are frivolous cloture motions undermines the whole purpose of the Senate.

I am a student of the Senate. I love the Senate. Cloture should be used rarely, when there is a real extended debate. We have not had an extended debate. We are ready to vote. So it is a method where some people are trying to use it to stop amendments that are not liked and on which they do not want to vote.

Again, the Senator from Idaho, the Senators from the West, are entitled to say we want at least part of what the majority leader was able to do in his State. We are going to protect the rights of the minority to be able to offer amendments. We are going to protect the rights of Senator GRAMM and Senator MILLER to offer the President's proposal. Cloture on these two bills is not going to work. It would not work anyway.

I am tempted to say let's give cloture and then offer the amendment tomorrow after we wait 30 hours; waste a couple of days and then offer the amendment again. We can do that. Maybe we should do that. It might prove our point that cloture is not the way to go when filing amendments dealing with appropriations bills. It really does not let the Senate work. The Senate should work, but frankly the Senate is not working.

Fingers can be pointed at the House of Representatives, but the reason why the House has not done more bills is because there has not been a budget. The House has passed a budget and the Senate has not passed a budget.

When I say I am embarrassed for the Senate, I am embarrassed for the majority because they have not passed a budget. They did not even bring a budget resolution to the floor of the Senate. A budget does not take 60 votes to pass. It takes 51 votes to pass in the Senate. For the first time since 1974, the majority did not bring a budget to the floor of the Senate. Because we do not have a budget, we do not have like figures between the House and the Senate. We do not have figures in the Senate because we have not passed it.

So fingers can be pointed at the House and one can say the House has only passed so many appropriations bills, but they have passed more than the Senate has. There is nothing in the Constitution that says the Senate has to wait on the House to pass appropriations bills. That has been the tradition, but it is not mandatory. If the House is not doing its work, we should go ahead and pass our appropriations bills, period.

I mentioned this to Chairman BYRD, and I hope we will do that. The Senate should pass appropriations bills. If the House has not passed them, let us pass them.

The end of the fiscal year is next Monday. I cannot remember any time in my 22 years in the Senate that the Senate has done so little in the appropriations process with 1 week to go in the fiscal year. Shame on the Senate. People can point fingers at the President that he would not give us an extra $9 billion—really, I think the difference is closer to $13 billion. Between the Senate Democrats and the President of the United States, I believe it is about $13 billion. Why don't we pass everything we agree on or take the House figure and then if Senators want to pass another $9 billion, do that in a supplemental? We could do that.

So we could pass the bulk of the $759 billion and then for the additional $9 billion or $12 billion, that could be put in a supplemental and the President could sign or veto it. At least then we would have done our job and we would be able to have appropriations for the bulk of the Federal Government.

Right now we are not doing anything. We are not functioning. The Senate is becoming dysfunctional. To only pass three appropriations bills at this late stage is very irresponsible, and I do not get any comfort by having fingers pointed at the House or the White House. The Senate is the one that did not pass the budget, and the Senate has not passed its appropriations bills.

We are an equal branch to the White House. So why don't we do our work? We are an equal division to the House of Representatives. If the House is not doing its work, let's do our work. It goes back to the budget because if we have a budget, we have similar levels to work from, and then, since the House and the Senate are working from the same levels, they have something to go to conference with and come up with suitable compromises.

This should not be this difficult. I am flabbergasted this is our fourth week now on the Interior appropriations bill, a bill that has total spending of about $18 billion or $19 billion. The $18 billion is a very small amount in the total scheme of Federal appropriations, which is more like $760 billion. It should not take us 4 weeks to do that. If it is going to take us 4 weeks to do the Interior bill, we are never going to finish the larger bills.

If the majority leader wants to have more cloture votes, that is fine, but I think the managers of the bill should come down to the floor and say it is time for us to move on. Let's either vote up or down on the amendments or let's move to table the amendments, finish these appropriations bills, and get our work done as we have the constitutional responsibility to get our work done.

I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I am not going to spend a lot of time responding to my friend, the assistant Republican leader. But I say, no matter what you call a filibuster, it is still a filibuster. We are 4 weeks on two bills. Check the history of this body. How often do we spend 4 weeks on a bill? We do not unless there is a filibuster, and that is what we have here. The majority leader, Senator DASCHLE, is trying to stop debate so we can go ahead and finish these bills.

The President has told everybody he wants homeland security, but he sure is acting strangely if he really wants this legislation passed. There is simply nothing to show the President really wants this bill. In fact, what this is showing is that on this issue, Iraq, and anything else he can do to keep away from domestic policy, he is doing it. We have a stumbling, staggering, faltering economy, and we should do something about it.

We have in the dark holes of the other body, these conference committees, legislation that has been held up for months and months. There is terrorism insurance. Important? Of course it is. We have major construction projects—I will bet in Minneapolis and other places in Minnesota and in Las Vegas and other places—that are being held up because we don't have terrorism insurance. Why? They won't let us complete a bill. Election reform—we had another debacle in Florida—still no election reform, held up in conference; bankruptcy reform, held up in conference with the House; Patients' Bill of Rights, held up in conference with the House; generic drugs, held up in the House.

We haven't done our appropriations bills because they will not move them in the House. This is a filibuster. They are doing everything they can to keep away from the fact that the stock market is at its lowest in 6 years. The stock market drop is more than in the time of the Great Depression. There were 2 million unemployed persons in the last 2 years—additional unemployed people. We had a huge surplus, in the trillions of dollars, a year ago at this time. We are now broke.

So this is a filibuster. It is a filibuster. It is a filibuster.

Mr. President, are we on the homeland security bill at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 4515, 4568, AND 4565

Mr. REID. At this time I ask unanimous consent it be in order to consider the following amendments: No. 4515, No. 4568, and No. 4565.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

U.S. MILITARY CONSTRUCTION IN EUROPE

Mrs. FEINSTEIN. Mr. President, as chair of the Military Construction Appropriations Subcommittee, I have the opportunity and responsibility to take a close look at our military's construction needs throughout the world.

During our August recess, I chose to take a closer look at an initiative recently implemented by the Army in Europe called "Efficient Basing". This initiative is a two part process that will streamline the Army's infrastructure needs in Germany and in Italy.

The plan will direct much needed funds to consolidate U.S. bases throughout Germany, and better position an airborne battalion south of the Alps in Vicenza, Italy to more quickly respond to the possibility of crisis in the Transcaucasus, the Balkans, the Middle East and Africa.

Although the costs for this initiative could total nearly $1 billion when complete, there is little doubt that it will both dramatically reduce the long term costs of basing our forces in Western Europe and provide better strategic positioning for regional conflicts and the global war on terrorism.

This aptly named "Efficient Basing" initiative is being guided by the U.S. Army's European Commander in Chief, Gen. Montgomery Meigs. General Meigs invited me to Europe to take a closer look at the work in progress and allow him the opportunity to justify the costs associated with the program. As a result, I went to Camp Ederle, in Vicenza, Italy, and was able to see first hand the real efficiency of this tremendously large task and recognize the actual savings to be gained.

I would like to take a few minutes to recognize the degree of dedication and service to our country that is often overlooked.

Whether fighting a war, or carrying out the daily administrative tasks necessary to provide protection for America at home and abroad, our military commanders and the soldiers within their command display a level of dedication, efficiency, and selflessness that is awe inspiring.

We ask a lot of our soldiers, sailors, Marines and airmen. And, without question, they are up to the task, whatever it might be.

Let me give just a couple of examples: In his nearly 35 years of military service, General Meigs and his wife, Mary-Ann have moved their family 24 times. That's not just soldier dedication, that's family dedication—all for the sake of our freedom. This sacrifice is recognized throughout the world, not only by Americans, but by our allies and partners as well.

In the wake of September 11, a strangely surprising and caring act took place on the part of our Italian allies. In less than 24 hours, the Carabinieri—Italian police—in a show of force protection, came out in large numbers to surround our Vicenza base, Camp Ederle.

The base didn't solicit their presence. It was given voluntarily.

Acts like this do not just happen—they take time and the creation of a rapport built on admiration and years of interaction with our commanders and soldiers. The actions of the Carabinieri was, in part, a response to a lasting friendship—a friendship forged by men like MG Robert Wagner, the Southern European Task Force, SETAF, Commander.

General Wagner, a shining example for all to follow, is one hundred percent engaged with the leaders of the community—the mayor, the director of the Carabinieri, and businesses leaders throughout northern Italy.

The relationships and mutual admiration did not just happen by virtue of his position. It was developed over time, by him and by his predecessors, who hosted dinners and got to know these leaders and their needs, as well as expressing his concerns for our soldiers and the community in which they live and work.

The relationship between General Wagner and the community is priceless, but the care and concern he expresses for his soldiers is even more evident.

I was pleasantly amazed by the spontaneously unsolicited comments by persons like the local base librarian, who takes pride in his facilities and the services that he is able to provide to some 750 daily visitors. The same type of pride was exhibited by the director of the commissary, who manages a clean, well stocked facility and therefore plays a critical role in the morale and welfare of those who defend us.

A long time concern of mine has been the high operational tempo, or more simply put, the rate at which our service members are deployed away from their home base, whether for training, or deployed in reaction to a crisis.

In Vicenza, Italy, I met an impressive young man—a Californian—1SG Noel Fernando. First Sergeant Fernando, a native of Salinas, California, talked to me about his highly trained Airborne unit's operational tempo.

Sergeant Fernando, a hard worker who achieved his very high enlisted rank at an early age, assured me that more organized planning and early notification to family members regarding deployment schedules has reduced the trauma experienced by younger soldiers and their loved ones. They are now better able to anticipate deployments and plan accordingly.

Another distinguished member of our military forces is Gen. Joe Ralston. General Ralston is the Commander in Chief, U.S. European Command and the NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe.

As Commander in Chief of U.S. European Command, he is the senior U.S. military officer and commander of a unified combatant command with an area of responsibility, that includes 89 nations in Europe, Africa and the Middle East. General Ralston will be retiring soon, and just like many service members before, he and his family have sacrificed much of their lives for our freedom.

I was pleased to have been escorted by General Ralston to the sites of several upcoming military construction projects in the Mons, Belgium area.

The first is a barracks complex that will accommodate soldiers at the "one-plus-one" housing standard. Another project will add a classroom to the SHAPE, Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe, elementary school.

While there, I had an opportunity to visit this site and visit with the students and teachers. I am pleased to report that the administrators of this and other military schools in Europe have been able to reduce the student to teacher ratio significantly, thus offering a quality education for our military dependents.

In summary, I would like to emphasize the important role that our officers, enlisted members, and their families play in creating good will around the world for the people of America.

As I have mentioned previously, all of these people dedicate their lives, and to a certain degree their personal freedom, to ensure our nation's remains free. These military service members and their families deserve quality facilities wherever they might be stationed.

This is why, I feel honored to sit as chair of the Appropriations Military Construction Subcommittee, because it allows me to make a difference in the living and working conditions for our troops who are willing to make the ultimate sacrifice on our nation's behalf. I am dedicated to providing first class facilities for them both at home and abroad.

Lastly, it is with great pride that I commend those service members like General Ralston, General Meigs, General Wagner and First Sergeant Fernando, who have for decades sought to ensure a better quality of life for our fighting force.

U.S. INTERNATIONAL TRADE POLICY

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr President, this year marks an historic turning point for U.S. international trade policy. For the first time in over eight years the Congress renewed the President's authority to negotiate new trade agreements. This authority, called Trade Promotion Authority, reestablishes the traditional partnership on trade between the Congress and the Executive branch. It allows us to work together to open new markets for American exports, set fair rules of conduct for U.S. investors overseas, and help raise the standard of living for millions of people around the world.

The negotiating objectives and procedures laid out in the Bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act represent a very careful substantive and political balance on some very complex and difficult issues such as investment, labor and the environment, and the relationship between Congress and the Executive branch during international trade negotiations.

Because this balance is so delicate, I was somewhat dismayed to learn recently that some groups and Members of Congress are trying to push for interpretations of certain provisions of the TPA bill that do not comport with the negotiating objectives laid out in the Bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act. For example, an article in the September 18, 2002 edition of National Journal's CongressDaily noted that "a group of labor officials who were active in the fight against, TPA, are meeting in the offices of the AFL-CIO. At the top of their agenda: mapping a plan to ensure future trade agreements include strong provisions on labor rights and the environment. Labor officials plan to hold future agreements to standards set in an earlier free-trade agreement reached with Jordan, which they consider a model of backing up labor and environmental provisions with enforceable sanctions." Some Members of Congress are even arguing that future agreements must follow the "Jordan Standard" on labor and environment in order to meet the objectives laid out in the TPA bill. Perhaps even more ominous were the public remarks of the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee who urged the administration to follow the model of the Jordan Free Trade Agreement "exactly" in implementing the labor and environment provisions of the Bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act.

On this issue, I respectfully disagree with my colleague from Montana. In fact, I think this would be a serious mistake. The negotiating objectives in the TPA bill set the parameters for future trade negotiations, not some past agreement like the Jordan FTA that was negotiated during the Clinton Administration. To follow the provisions of this past agreement "exactly" would ignore the clear will of Congress as set forth in the TPA bill. Even more disconcerting is that such a stark litmus test ignores that basic premise that the most appropriate mechanisms to improve labor and environment standards abroad differ from country to country and agreement to agreement. In short, one size does not fit all.

Trying to solve complex environmental and labor issues with rigid constructs will do nothing to actually improve environmental or labor standards abroad. At the same time, demanding that our trading partners accept specific language laid out in past agreements during trade negotiations will come at a heavy price for our farmers and workers, as our trading partners can demand significant concessions on other issues, such as agriculture, in exchange for our rigid insistence that they accept specific language from our trade negotiators. The Administration and Members of Congress need to remember that the underlying premise of the TPA Act is to provide the President and our trade negotiators with flexibility so they can negotiate the best trade agreements for the American people. It is not intended, nor should it be used, to try to tie the President's hands on any particular issue.

It is also troubling that some advocacy groups are pushing to ensure that future free trade agreements adhere to their version of so-called "Jordan Standard." I think it bears repeating that it is the negotiating objectives laid out in the Trade Promotion Authority bill that should guide the Administration in future trade negotiations, not a single free trade agreement that was concluded long before TPA became law.

I also believe it would be a political miscalculation to insist that new trade agreements must follow the "Jordan Standard" to gain support in Congress. First, no one really knows what the "Jordan Standard" is. In fact, when we held a hearing on the Jordan Free Trade Agreement on March 20, 2001 in the Senate Finance Committee, one of the most controversial issues raised was what the labor and environmental provisions of the Jordan Free Trade Agreement actually mean. For example, former United States Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky testified that the labor and environment provisions in the Jordan FTA "while restating the existing commitment of both countries to environmental protection and the ILO's core labor standards, neither imposes new standards nor bars change or reform of national laws as each country sees fit."

Ambassador Michael Smith, former Deputy United States Trade Representative and the first American Ambassador to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, testified that "Articles 5 and 6 [of the Jordan FTA] as written are largely fluff, open to widely differing, even if plausible, interpretations and, as such, causes for possible unfortunate differences between Jordan and the United States in the years ahead as the agreement is implemented. Articles 5 and 6 do not advance the "cause" of either international environmental or labor affairs and add only confusion to what should be a straightforward free trade agreement. Indeed, the only result I can foresee is countries adopting lower environmental and labor standards for fear of themselves being unable to effectively enforce higher standards hardly a desired result."

During the hearing it became clear that labor and environment provisions, and their relationship to the dispute settlement procedures established in the Jordan FTA, are highly controversial. A number of groups, including the American Farm Bureau Federation and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, strongly opposed including the labor and environment provisions in the Jordan FTA without some clarification from the Administration that these provisions would not be implemented in a trade restrictive manner. Many members of the Republican party, including myself, shared these concerns. Had the U.S. Government not agreed to side letters with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, clarifying that these and other provisions would not be implemented in a manner that results in blocking trade, it is highly likely that the agreement would not have gained the support of the Republican caucus in the Senate, and may not have passed the Senate at all. And, if the proposed agreement had not been with our good friend and ally Jordan, side letters may not have been enough.

I think this represents an important political reality which the Administration must gauge in entering into new free trade agreements. Almost 90 percent of the Republican Caucus in the House and Senate supported passage of Trade Promotion Authority. In contrast, only 12 percent of the House Democratic Caucus and 40 percent of the Senate Democratic Caucus supported the bill. And the price for that support was high. Clearly, if future free trade agreements are going to pass Congress, the strong support of the Republican caucus will be key.

In short, I am deeply concerned that some advocacy groups and Members of Congress are pushing the Administration to adhere to a highly controversial and vague "Jordan Standard" which does not have the strong support of the Congress and that is not clearly reflected in the Trade Promotion Authority negotiating objectives. While the labor, environment, and dispute settlement negotiating objectives in the Bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act are loosely based on provisions found in the Jordan Free Trade Agreement, there is clearly a distinction between the two. In implementing the will of Congress as embodied in the Trade Promotion Authority Act, it is critically important for the administration to keep this distinction in mind if future agreements are to gain the support of myself and other strong supporters of free trade in the Congress.

Before I conclude I would like to talk about another important development in U.S. trade policy. Last week, for the very first time, the bipartisan, bicameral Congressional Oversight Group, COG, met with Ambassador Zoellick to discuss pending and future trade agreements. The COG was created by the Trade Promotion Authority Act to provide an additional consultative mechanism for Members of Congress and to provide advice to the U.S. Trade Representative on trade negotiations.

The COG is comprised of: the Chairmen and Ranking Members of the Finance and Ways and Means Committees; three additional members from the Senate Finance Committee, no more than two of whom may be of the same political party; three additional Members of the House Ways and Means Committee, no more than two of whom may be of the same political party; and the chairman and ranking member or their designees of the committees of the House or Senate which would have, under the Rules of the House or Senate, "jurisdiction over provisions of law affected by a trade agreement negotiations for which are conducted at any time during that Congress."

The purpose of the COG is to "consult and provide advice to the Trade Representative regarding the formulation of specific objectives, negotiating strategies and positions, the development of the applicable trade agreement, and compliance and enforcement of the negotiated commitments under the trade agreement." In addition, each member of the COG is to be accredited as an official adviser to the United States delegation in the negotiations. However, those Senators or Members who are Members of the COG because they are the chairman or ranking member of a Committee which has "jurisdiction over provisions of law affected by trade negotiations" are to be accredited as advisors only on those provisions which would fall under their Committee's jurisdiction.

The TPA bill makes it clear that the COG is a mechanism for enhanced consultations and that it is not designed to serve as a referendum on new agreements or on particular negotiating positions.

I am pleased to report that our first meeting was a great success. A number of Senators and Members of the House from both political parties attended the meeting, including the chairmen and ranking members of both the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means Committees. During the meeting Ambassador Zoellick expressed his strong support for enhanced consultations and his keen interest in meeting with the COG on a regular basis. I certainly would support his enthusiastic efforts.

The TPA bill also requires the chairmen and ranking members of both the Finance and Ways and Means Committees to establish guidelines for the exchange of information between the Congress and the Executive branch. I plan to work diligently to ensure that these guidelines are feasible and that the resulting exchange of information is meaningful.

With the passage of the Bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority Act of 2002, we begin a new phase in the history of U.S. trade policy. Although the bill contains some new buttons and bows, the underlying premise of the bill remains the same as it was decades ago to give the administration the tools it needs to liberalize trade and create new opportunities for America's farmers, ranchers and workers. As the Ranking Member of the Senate Finance Committee, I intend to ensure that the Trade Promotion Authority Act is implemented in a manner that does just that.

VISIT OF TAIWAN'S FIRST LADY CHEN WU SUE-JEN

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, Washington is graced this week by the visit of Madame Chen Wu Sue-Jen, the First Lady of Taiwan and a distinguished humanitarian and advocate for human rights. Mrs. Chen has worked tirelessly to promote human rights and democratization on Taiwan. In tandem with her husband, President Chen Shui-Bien, Mrs. Chen has worked to open up the Taiwanese political system and ensure that the Taiwan Government reflects all its citizens' views and interests. Taiwan's democracy serves as an model to Chinese-speaking people around the world, and as compelling evidence that human rights and democracy are truly universal aspirations.

The struggle for democratization is never quick or easy, and in Mrs. Chen's case, it led to very personal sacrifice. When leaving a campaign rally in 1985, she was hit by a vehicle that left her paralyzed from the waist down. While some might view that as a justification to withdraw from public life, in the case of Mrs. Chen, it only reinforced her commitment to public service, and she went on to serve with distinction in Taiwan's legislature. Her experience has also given her a profound sense of identification with the disabled, whom she has worked as First Lady to support. While here in Washington, Mrs. Chen will meet with the Red Cross and the National Rehabilitation Hospital to discuss the work she has done in Taiwan to promote the rights of the disabled.

It has been pointed out that Mrs. Chen's visit is the first visit by a First Lady of the Republic of China since Soong May-ling, better known here as Madame Chiang, traveled to Washington to ask for U.S. support in 1943. Since that turbulent period, America has maintained close ties with the Republic of China. The United States has had, and will continue to have, a unique partnership with Taiwan, and the people on Taiwan should remain assured that they have no better friend than the United States.

But this week's historic milestone also marks a good opportunity to reflect the vast distance the Republic of China has traveled between 1943 and now. Today when Taiwan talks with the United States, it does so as a vibrant democracy, a flourishing economy, a major trading partner and investor in the United States, and an important partner of the U.S. in our efforts to preserve peace and stability in East Asia.

There is no better reflection of today's Taiwan than this dedicated woman who embodies so many of the positive changes that have occurred on the island. This week's visit will give Americans an opportunity to deepen their understanding of Taiwan by meeting with one of its most accomplished and articulate representatives. It gives me great pleasure to welcome my friend, Madame Chen Wu, to Washington. I urge my colleagues to take this opportunity to get to know her, you will be glad you did.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I welcome Taiwan's First Lady, Madame Chen Wu Sue-jen, to Washington, D.C. and remark on her considerable accomplishments. As many of my colleagues are aware, Madame Chen Wu was paralyzed from the waist down after being hit by an automobile in 1985, and is permanently confined to a wheelchair. Despite this tragic event, Madame Chen Wu has persevered.

In 1986, when her husband, now President Chen Shui-bian, was imprisoned on political charges, Madame Chen Wu ran on her husband's behalf for a seat in the national legislature—and won. Since then, she has played a crucial role as confidant and supporter to President Chen as he progressed from legislator to Mayor of Taipei and now in this current office.

The courage and optimism Madame Chen Wu demonstrates, in spite of her physical limitation, serves as a source of inspiration for all. Continuously upbeat in life, Madame Chen provides tremendous support to all who know her. Her strength of character has done much to transform the role of Taiwan's First Lady.

So, it is with great pleasure that I welcome Madame Chen Wu to the United States, to Washington, D.C., and am confident that her visit will only serve to strengthen U.S.-Taiwan relations.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I rise to speak about Taiwan's First Lady, Madam Chen Wu Sue-jen, who is visiting Washington this week for the first time in her capacity as First Lady. As a dear friend of Taiwan, and on behalf of my colleagues in the United States Senate, I would like to welcome Madam Chen Wu to Washington. I hope her visit is pleasant and productive.

Mr. President, Madam Chen Wu is truly a delightful and remarkable lady. I am in awe of her courage in the face of adversary. I am especially moved by her refusal to allow being a victim of an automobile accident, which rendered her disabled, from ending her outspoken advocacy for democracy in Taiwan.

Madam Chen Wu successfully ran for office herself, becoming a lawmaker. She later focused her efforts to make her husband one of Taiwan's eminent political figures. Her dreams and hopes for him became fulfilled when Chen Shui-bian was elected president of the Republic of China in 2000.

Since taking office, President Chen has exhibited great leadership and courage in the face of the People's Republic of China's constant menace. President Chen has also shown his compassion and friendship to the American people in the wake of the tragic attacks on the citizens of the United States of America. I am certain these fine traits have been honed in part through the example Madam Chen Wu has played in his life.

To this day, First Lady, Madam Chen Wu has not changed. She is still the same Chen Wu Sue-jen of years ago: an innocent schoolgirl from Matou, Tainan County, Taiwan. She has retained all the charm and grace of a young Taiwanese girl who later became a wife, mother, politician and First Lady.

The United States of America welcomes you, Madam Chen Wu.

U.S.A. PATRIOT ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on behalf of the listed Senators, a joint statement of myself, Senator THURMOND, Senator KYL, Senator DEWINE, Senator SESSIONS, and Senator MCCONNELL regarding the Committee on the Judiciary, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE U.S.A. PATRIOT ACT IN PRACTICE: SHEDDING LIGHT ON THE FISA PROCESS

Prior to the U.S.A. PATRIOT Act of 2001, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 authorized the government to gather intelligence on agents of foreign powers with less stringent requirements than those required for surveillance of domestic criminals. The courts interpreted FISA as requiring that gathering foreign intelligence be the "primary purpose" of the surveillance of the foreign agent. See United States v. Duggan, 743 F.2d 59, 77 (2nd Cir. 1984); United States v. Truong Dinh Hung, 629 F.2d 908 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1154 (1982).

This statutory regime worked well during the cold war for conducting surveillance on spies who were either foreign nationals employed by foreign government working under diplomatic cover at foreign embassies in the United States, or United States persons in this country who had been recruited to spy by foreign intelligence agencies. Both were clearly "agents of a foreign power," and gathering foreign intelligence on the activities of these targets was generally the "primary purpose," if not the only purpose, of the surveillance.

The statutory regime did not work as well with respect to terrorists, who did not work for a foreign government, who often financed their operations with criminal activities, such as drug dealing, and who began to target American interests. It was more difficult to determine if such terrorists were "agents of a foreign power" and it was difficult for the government to keep the appropriate types of investigators, intelligence or criminal, involved in the operation.

To determine what the "primary purpose" of a surveillance was, courts looked to what type of federal investigators were managing and directing the surveillance operation. If intelligence investigators managed and directed the surveillance, courts interpreted the primary purpose of the surveillance to be gathering foreign intelligence, thus requiring the government to comply with the less stringent FISA surveillance procedures. On the other hand, if criminal investigators managed and directed the surveillance, courts interpreted the primary purpose of the surveillance to be gathering criminal evidence, thus requiring the government to comply with the more stringent Title III wiretap procedures or to exclude the evidence from court. In short, the courts held that there could be only one primary purpose, and it was either gathering foreign intelligence or gathering criminal evidence. See, e.g., Truong, 629 F.2d at 912–13.

The attacks on September 11, 2001, appeared to be orchestrated by the Al Qaeda, an international terrorist organization, with no embassies or diplomats, and whose operatives were loosely associated small groups who often engaged in criminal activities. The intelligence agencies and criminal investigators were unable to analyze and disseminate information needed to detect and prevent the September 11th attacks partly because of restrictions on their ability to share information and coordinate tactical strategies in order to disrupt foreign terrorist activities. It was apparent that the existing court interpretation of the FISA requirement of "primary purpose" impeded the sharing and coordination of information between criminal and intelligence investigators on foreign terrorists.

Accordingly, Congress enacted the USA Patriot Act, in part, to replace the "primary purpose" requirement with a less stringent requirement, and to increase consultation and coordination efforts between intelligence and federal law enforcement officers to investigate and protect against foreign terrorist threats. See Sections 218 and 504. Three replacement standards were discussed for determining how large a purpose gathering foreign intelligence must be in order for a FISA warrant to issue: (1) a substantial purpose; (2) a significant purpose; and (3) a purpose. With multiple purposes in an investigation of an international terrorist, there could be only one "primary" purpose, but more than one "substantial", "significant," or "a" purposes. A "substantial" purpose of gathering foreign intelligence was viewed to be less than primary, but more than a de minimis purpose. A "significant" purpose of gathering foreign intelligence was deemed to be less than "significant," but more than a de minimis purpose. And "a purpose" of gathering foreign intelligence was deemed to include a de minimis purpose.

Congress chose the word "significant" purpose to replace the existing FISA requirement of a "primary" purpose. By this we intended that the purpose to gather intelligence could be less than the main or dominant purpose, but nonetheless important and not de minimis. Because a significant purpose of gathering foreign intelligence was not the primary or dominant purpose, it was clear to us that in a FISA search or surveillance involving multiple purposes, gathering criminal evidence could be the primary purpose as long as gathering foreign intelligence was a significant purpose in the investigation. See generally, e.g., United States v. Soto-Silva, 129 F.3d 340, 347 (5th Cir. 1997) (holding that a defendant who maintained a house for the "primary purpose" of taking care of a family member also maintained the house for a "significant purpose" of distributing marijuana).

The Department of Justice confirmed the meaning of the change from primary purpose to significant purpose in a letter supporting the amendment sent on October 1, 2001, to the Chairmen and Ranking Members of the House and Senate Judiciary and Intelligence Committees. The Department stated that the amendment would recognize that "the courts should not deny [the President] the authority to conduct intelligence searches even when the national security purpose is secondary to criminal prosecution."

The understanding of increased cooperation between intelligence and law enforcement was confirmed by voices in the House and the Senate in the days and weeks immediately following the new FISA standard. "This legislation authorizes the sharing of information between criminal investigators and those engaged in foreign intelligence-gathering. It provides for enhanced wiretap and surveillance authority. It brings the basic building blocks of a criminal investigation, pen registers and trap and trace provisions, into the 21st century to deal with e-mails and Internet communications." 147 Cong. Rec. H7196 (daily ed. Oct. 23, 2001) (statement of Rep. SENSENBRENNER). "The core provisions of the legislation we passed in the Senate 2 weeks ago remain firmly in place. For instance, in the future, our law enforcement and intelligence communities will be able to share information and cooperate fully in protecting our Nation against terrorist attacks." 147 Cong. Rec. S11016 (daily ed. Oct. 25, 2001) (statement of Sen. HATCH).

In addition, a news publication confirmed the general understanding on Capitol Hill during the consideration of the U.S.A. PATRIOT Act. The Congressional Quarterly reported separately on October 8, 9, and 23, 2001: "Under the measure, for example, law enforcement could carry out a FISA operation even if the primary purpose was a criminal investigation." Congr. Q., House Action Reports, Fact Sheet No: 107-33, at p. 3 (Oct. 9, 2001); see Cong. Q., House Action Reports, Legislative Week, at p. 3 (Oct. 23, 2001); Cong. Q., House Action Reports, Legislative Week, at p. 13 (Oct. 8, 2001). FISA may not be used "even if the primary purpose is a criminal investigation." Cong. Q. Billwatch Brief, H.R. 3162 (Oct. 23, 2001).

It was our intent when we included the plain language of Section 218 of the U.S.A. PATRIOT Act and when we voted for the Act as a whole to change FISA to allow a foreign intelligence surveillance warrant to be obtained when "a significant" purpose of the surveillance was to gather foreign intelligence, even when the primary purpose of the surveillance was the gathering of criminal evidence.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 2001

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise today to speak about hate crimes legislation I introduced with Senator KENNEDY in March of last year. The Local Law Enforcement Act of 2001 would add new categories to current hate crimes legislation sending a signal that violence of any kind is unacceptable in our society.

I would like to describe a terrible crime that occurred September 22, 2002, in West Hollywood, CA. Two men brutally attacked a 55 year old gay man walking in West Hollywood, the second such attack in West Hollywood this month. The assailants beat the victim with a baseball bat and metal pipe while yelling anti-gay slurs. The attackers, who match the description of the men who attacked a 34 year old actor on September 1, fled when a cab driver stopped to help the victim. The victim received treatment at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center following the assault.

I believe that Government's first duty is to defend its citizens, to defend them against the harms that come out of hate. The Local Law Enforcement Enhancement Act of 2001 is now a symbol that can become substance. I believe that by passing this legislation and changing current law, we can change hearts and minds as well.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TRIBUTE TO DR. ROBERT P. MAGGARD AND CHARLES MILBURN

• Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate two outstanding Montanans, whose enthusiasm and work ethic exhibit the true spirit of our Nation.

Each year the Experience Works program salutes our Nation's senior workforce. This non-profit organization selects an Outstanding Older Worker from each of the 50 States and Puerto Rico to pay tribute to the contributions that our older individuals are making in the workforce as well as in their communities.

This year Montana will be saluting the 2001 Outstanding Worker, Dr. Robert P. Maggard and the 2002 Outstanding Worker, Mr. Charles E. Milburn.

Dr. Maggard, originally from Omaha, Nebraska, served in World War II, and then graduated from Creighton University where he studied dentistry. Dr. Maggard, moved to Yellowstone Valley, Montana and began his practice in the 1950's. He sold his practice in 1987 and began working with the Elite Denture Center, which allows dentistry service at a reasonable price to thousands who would not otherwise be able to afford it.

Charles Milburn retired from his long career in retail in New York City, to return home to his native State of Montana. After one year of retirement he began volunteering with the Computerized Books for the Blind. He quickly became the organization's most productive volunteer. He currently works at the Disability Services for Students and is now the president of Roxie M. Anderson Memorial fund which gives help to young teenage mothers.

These two men are truly worthy of the Outstanding Older Worker award. This award represents the dedication these men have exhibited throughout their lives, and both the State of Montana and I are proud of their hard work.•

IN MEMORY OF JAMIE CHRISTENSON AND ERIC HURST

• Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I rise today to offer my thoughts and prayers to the family of Jamie Christenson of Marshalltown, Iowa and Eric Hurst of Ventura, California. Bob and Debra Christenson suffered a terrible loss this summer when their young daughter, Jamie, died in a tragic swimming accident in Minnesota at the young age of 17. The Hurst family lost Eric, only 24, as he valiantly attempted to save Jamie's life.

Jamie Christenson was one of 53 campers from Trinity Lutheran Church in Marshalltown who were at Camp Vermillion, near Cook, Minnesota. While on a canoeing trip on the afternoon of July 30, Jamie and her friends took a break from carrying their canoes around the more treacherous falls and began cooling off in the waters near Upper Basswood Falls, in Minnesota's Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness.

Beyond the falls, Jamie and a group of campers donned life preservers and entered the water. There, in what had appeared to be calm and shallow waters, Jamie was caught in a swift undercurrent and pulled below the river.

Several campers and boaters in the area rushed to her rescue, including Eric Hurst, who was working on the river as a canoe guide. Sadly, the river claimed both of their lives.

The State of Minnesota and Governor Jesse Ventura have each issued a posthumous certificate of commendation for heroism to the family of Eric Hurst. It is my hope that the Senate can act in some similar fashion, or, that there can be some other Federal recognition of Eric's efforts to save Jamie's life.

As the father of two daughters, I can think of no pain deeper than to lose a child. I offer my deepest condolences to Bob and Debra, their family, and to Jamie's many friends, as well as to the family and friends of Eric Hurst. In times of such pain, words fall far short of comfort we wish we could provide to those in mourning, but even words are we can offer.

So I offer the words of the Greek poet Aeschylus: "In our sleep, pain which cannot forget falls drop by drop upon the heart until, in our own despair, against our will, comes wisdom through the awful grace of God."

To the Christenson family and the Hurst family, I offer these words as a prayer for an end to their sorrow.●

LEO JOHN SWEENEY JR. AND CATHERINE EILEEN CLAFFEY SWEENEY'S 25TH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. CARPER. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate John and Eileen Sweeney, who will celebrate their 25th wedding anniversary on November 25, 2002.

As they celebrate this milestone in their lives, they will surely reflect on the many changes, successes, and accomplishments they have experienced together over the last 25 years. Theirs is a journey of which they can be proud.

Leo John Sweeney Jr. is the son of the late Leo John Sweeney Sr. and Isabelle Moore Sweeney, and is a lifelong Wilmingtonian. He is a graduate of St. Elizabeth's Elementary School and Salesianum High School. His wife, Catherine Eileen Claffey Sweeney, is the daughter of the late John J. Claffey and Alice G. Rowan Claffey, and is also from Wilmington. She is a graduate of St. Paul's Elementary School and St. Paul's Commercial School.

John and Eileen met and began dating in early 1976 and became engaged in June 1977. They were married on November 25, 1977, at St. Joseph's on the Brandywine Roman Catholic Church in Wilmington. They made a welcoming home on South Broom Street.

A lieutenant, John has worked at the Wilmington Fire Department for 28 years. In 1961, he played in Delaware's Annual Blue and Gold All-Star Football Game, and, on the 25th anniversary of the Blue/Gold Game in 1980, John began umpiring these games. He continues to umpire high school football games today.

Eileen has worked for the Catholic Diocese for 30 years and has also served as Publicity Chair for the St. Patrick's Day Parade Committee. In 1994, she opened an Irish Shop in the Forty-Acres neighborhood. We have shared many laughs together at the Irish Culture Club of Delaware over the years.

Today, I congratulate John and Eileen on their 25th wedding anniversary. Both have shown great service and commitment to their family and their community. I know that their years together hold many beautiful memories. It is my hope that those ahead will be filled with continued joy and contentment. I wish them both the very best in all that lies ahead.●

HONORING ANNA MARIE O'LOUGHLIN

● Mr. CORZINE. Mr. President, I rise today to honor Anna Marie O'Loughlin, a woman who has dedicated more than a decade of her life to advocating and caring for children in the foster care and adoption system. Her boundless energy, courage, and commitment to children make her an outstanding parent and an asset to the State of New Jersey. I congratulate her on receiving of the 2002 Congressional Angel in Adoption Award.

In 1991, Anna Marie O'Loughlin and her husband, Frank, adopted their first child from the New Jersey Division of Youth and Family Services, DYFS. Jason, a toddler born drug and alcohol addicted, suffered multiple learning disabilities as a result of his unfortunate start in life.

Five years later, Anna Marie and Frank adopted another child, a 10-year-old boy with an attachment disorder. Later that same year, the O'Loughlins volunteered to serve as foster parents, receiving their first foster child, an infant girl, in January of 1997. Seven months later the infant girl's biological sister joined the family. Anna Marie and Frank adopted both girls in December 2000.

In January 2001, Anna Marie left a twenty-year career in order to be more consistently available to her children, and opened her home and heart, this time as an emergency placement foster home for older children and teenagers. Children aged 2 to 17 passed through her home, some in the middle of the night, and moved on when DYFS found a foster home. Anna Marie established a particularly special relationship with one of these children, a 16-year-old boy who had been in multiple homes and treatment facilities. He would soon be forced to leave the foster care system due to his age, and would have been left to face an uncertain future on his own. However, Anna Marie stepped in with her characteristic determination to change that outcome, and in January 2002, the O'Loughlin home became a permanent foster home for this young man.

Over the course of these years, Anna Marie also became an outspoken advocate for children in the foster care and adoption system. She has served on the board of Concerned Parents for Adoption in a variety of positions, including president from 1996 to 2000. Currently, Anna Marie works as a co-trainer for adoptive and foster parent applicants. She presents workshops at the Concerned Parents for Adoption conference on older child adoption and teenage issues, offering a wealth of experience and practical knowledge.

Anna Marie has said that she cannot help feeling that her work is making a difference. Indeed, she has reached out to children in desperate need to offer them a better life. As our nation reaffirms its commitment to service, Anna Marie is a shining example. Again, I congratulate Anna Marie on her well-deserved recognition, and I thank her for her tireless efforts on behalf of children.●

RICHARD I. BONG WORLD WAR II HERITAGE CENTER

● Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, it is my honor today to celebrate the opening of the Richard I. Bong World War II Heritage Center in Superior, WI.

The Richard I. Bong World War II Heritage Center honors World War II participants both on the home front and on the battle front. Named for America's Ace of Aces and Congressional Medal of Honor recipient, MAJ Richard Bong, the new center tells visitors of all ages about World War II through the eyes of those who participated in the war effort.

Major Bong, a native of Poplar, WI, fell in love with aviation as a small boy, watching mail planes fly over the family farm. In 1940, at the age of 20, he became a flying cadet in the U.S. Army Air Corps. Major Bong downed 40 enemy aircraft in the Pacific theater of war and made Poplar famous. Today would have been Major Bong's 82nd birthday. We celebrate by opening the Richard I. Bong World War II Heritage Center which not only honors Major Bong's war efforts but also pays tribute to all brave veterans who never saw themselves as heroes but truly embody the word.●

IN RECOGNITION OF DR. RICHARD RYAN'S RETIREMENT FROM DES MOINES UNIVERSITY

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, one of Iowa's foremost leaders in medical and health sciences education, Dr. Richard M. Ryan Jr., has announced his retirement from Des Moines University at the end of this December. Today, I rise to acknowledge his many contributions to health care in the State of Iowa, the Nation and the world.

Dr. Ryan's career reflects his lifelong commitment to community and population-based medicine. He began his career with a doctoral degree in public health from Harvard University, and has continued to serve on numerous academic and health boards, professional organizations, committees, and task forces.

Harvard University, Boston University, and Tufts University have all been a part of Dr. Ryan's distinguished career in medical education and health services administration. Iowa was fortunate to attract Dr. Ryan in 1996, when he became president of Des Moines University.

Among his many accomplishments, Dr. Ryan created a new Public Health Program, significantly expanded the Des Moines University research enterprise, and laid the foundation for a campus revitalization plan. Under Dr. Ryan's leadership the University recently established a Geriatric Education Center on campus. Through all of these efforts, Dr. Ryan has helped to expand the reach and recognition of the University's medical and health sciences programs in Iowa and across the Nation.

Additionally Dr. Ryan has helped forge new partnerships within the community and state. The university's modern research laboratories welcome students from Iowa's public and private undergraduate institutions. Faculty and students from the University provide ongoing health care services and educational opportunities to students and teachers in the younger grade levels within the community.

A Navy veteran, Dr. Ryan has also distinguished himself through commitment to the welfare of veterans. He served as senior health consultant to the Chief of Health Services for the U.S. Coast Guard and as executive consultant to six medical directors of the Veterans Administration.

In addition to serving both public and private health care interests in the U.S., Dr. Ryan is highly regarded for his experience and expertise in international medicine. He has served as a consultant to ministries of health and education in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, and Russia.

Although I am saddened to see this great man retire, he has assured me that he intends to remain active and available to serve where needed, helping to ensure access to health care for all.

I commend Dr. Ryan for his commitment to the health care needs of the people of Iowa and the Nation through his many years of visionary leadership and dedicated service.•

NATIONAL OVARIAN CANCER AWARENESS MONTH

• Mrs. CARNAHAN. Mr. President, September is National Ovarian Cancer Awareness Month, and I want to draw your attention to some sobering facts.

Ovarian cancer is very difficult to diagnose and even more challenging to treat. While it is encouraging that scientific reports have shown an improvement in survival rates for women with ovarian cancer in recent years, sadly, the 5-year survival rate remains barely 50 percent. The American Cancer Society estimates that over 25,500 women are diagnosed with ovarian cancer and 14,500 women die from the disease annually. Poor long-term survival rates are mostly due to the lack of a reliable method of detection, with less than one-third of all ovarian cancer cases detected at the critical early stages when the disease is most treatable.

Since Congress established the Department of Defense Ovarian Cancer Research Program, OCRP, in 1997, the program has addressed the urgent problem of early detection by funding comprehensive research initiatives. The OCRP promotes research in ovarian cancer prevention and engages experts from multiple disciplines in genuinely collaborative efforts. The innovative proposals funded through the program foster new directions in research and strengthen long-term ovarian cancer research capabilities and networking among institutions.

Last year, I was proud to join Senator LANDRIEU and several of my colleagues in sponsoring Senate Resolution 163 designating a week in September as "National Ovarian Cancer Awareness Week." This resolution passed the Senate unanimously.

On April 30, I along with many of my colleagues sent a letter to the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee leadership requesting that funding for the Department of Defense, DOD, Ovarian Cancer Research Program be increased to $15 million in fiscal year 2003. While the Senate-passed bill did not include this level of funding, it did include $10 million for this important project. The House version completely cut funding. This funding level is currently being worked out in conference.

We must remain steadfast in our quest to ultimately conquer this terrible disease. I urge my colleagues to heed the slogan of the National Ovarian Cancer Coalition: "Ovarian Cancer . . . It Whispers . . . So Listen." To the one woman in 55 who will develop this disease during her lifetime, let me assure you, I'm listening.•

ISRAEL'S HEBREW UNIVERSITY

• Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, the civilized world was shocked and outraged when Palestinian militants planted a bomb on July 31, 2002 in a cafeteria at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. The bomb ultimately killed nine young people, including five young Americans, and injured an additional 80 people.

I agree with President George W. Bush, who condemned "in as strong as possible terms the attack that took place in Israel" and characterized those behind the bombings as "killers who hate the thought of peace."

What made the attack particularly heinous and unforgivable was the Hebrew University is an institution that constitutes an island of sanity and hope in a region that often seems to exemplify the opposite of those virtues.

Professor Menachem Magidor, President of Hebrew University, articulated these points in a letter published by The New York Times on August 9, 2002. He stated that this "was more than a murderous act. Specifically targeted against the heart of an academic campus, it was also an attack on what the university symbolizes and aspires to: understanding, tolerance and the quest for peace."

He went on to state that "The ethnic composition of the victims attests to the diversity and pluralism of our university family. The victims includes Jews and Palestinians, as well as citizens of the United States, France, Italy, South Korea, Turkey and Japan. Our university, where more than 10 percent of the 23,000 students are of Arab descent, is one of the very few places in which a meaningful dialogue between Jews and Arabs still takes place."

Hebrew University is, indeed, a unique and special institution. It is the oldest comprehensive institution of higher learning in Israel, and considered to be among the world's great universities.

The laying of the cornerstone for the university on Mt. Scopus in July 1918 was attended by Muslims, Jews and Christians. This set the tone for a university dedicated from its very beginnings to the pursuit of knowledge for the benefit not only of the then fledgling Jewish community of the land of Israel and for world Jewry, but also for all of the peoples of the region—including Muslims and Christians—and for humanity generally.

Seven years later, on April 1, 1925, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem was opened at a gala ceremony attended by leaders of world Jewry including the University's founding father, Chaim Weizmann, who would become in 1948 the first President of the new nation of Israel. Albert Einstein, one of the intellectual giants of the modern work, was also among the founding fathers of the institution.

As Palestine was then part of the British mandate, the British were represented by Lord Balfour, Viscount Allenby and Sir Herbert Samuel, all pivotal figures in the history of the region.

The University's first three research institutes were in microbiology, chemistry and Jewish studies, and the school began with a total of 33 faculty members and 141 students. The University awarded its first Master's degrees to 13 graduates in 1931.

By the time the British announced that they would leave Palestine in 1947, the University had grown into a well established research and teaching institution. As a result of the fighting in Jerusalem during the War of Independence in 1948, the University was cut off from the main Israeli-held sectors in the city. The University was forced to seek other quarters and its facilities were scattered throughout Jerusalem.

Construction began in 1953 on a new campus in the Givat Ram section of Jerusalem. Together with Hadassah Medical Organization, a few years later, Hebrew University began construction of a medical science campus in Ein Kerem in southwest Jerusalem.

By 1967, enrollment exceeded 12,500 at the two campuses in Jerusalem and Rehovot. The reunification of Jerusalem, as a result of the Six Day War in June 1967, enabled the university's leaders to restore and expand the original campus on Mt. Scopus. The Rothberg International School was opened there in 1971 and by 1981, Mt. Scopus was again the main campus for the university.

Thus, since its modest beginning, with its handful of students and staff, the university has grown remarkably to include an enrollment of some 23,000 students on four campuses, three of them in Jerusalem and another in Rehovot.

But this is a story of more than buildings. The university offers basic and advanced educational opportunities in virtually all fields of higher education, from humanities to the social sciences, chemistry, physics, life sciences, law, medicine, agriculture, engineering, social work, education and numerous other fields of study too numerous to mention. It offers degrees at all levels including B.A., B.S., Master's and Ph.D.

Although it attracts students of the front rank from all over Israel and abroad due to its reputation as a leading teaching institution, the university is also renowned internationally for the research carried out there in all of the sciences.

These research projects, numbering in the thousands, involve in many cases cooperative efforts with leading scientists and scholars, among them a substantial number of Americans. To get an idea of the quality of the research being pursued, one need only examine the leading scientific journals, such as Science or Nature, to see how often the names of Hebrew University researchers appear on their pages.

It is significant that scholars and researchers based at Hebrew University have competed for and received many grants from numerous American agencies and departments including NIH, NIST, DARPA, and USAID. Those in charge of reviewing such grant proposals have come to respect the substantive quality of the work done at Hebrew University. It is worth noting that many of these proposals are made in cooperation with American institutions, which has served to enhance the close relations between our people and especially our scientists. The results of these projects have benefitted Americans, Israelis and all mankind.

But it is more than the quality of its teaching and research that I wish to emphasize today in speaking about the special nature of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Indeed, there are many outstanding universities in our own country and elsewhere that are making significant contributions to our knowledge and to the progress of our world.

What I really want to stress is the singularity of this university in its vigorous efforts towards meeting the desperate need for the furtherance of those human values which we so treasure in our own country and which we consider to be the foundation stones of decent societies everywhere.

Specifically, I am speaking of elements that to us seem basic and which we probably take for granted: the free and unfettered pursuit of information, freedom of expression, tolerance for people of different religious, races and ethnic origins and for those whose world views may be different from our own. In brief, I am speaking of an openness that—all too sadly—does not exist in many societies and in many parts of the world.

It is precisely this pluralistic and tolerant spirit which has characterized the Hebrew University since its earliest days and which has through the years attracted students and scholars from the four corners of the world.

The student body today is a diverse and pluralistic one, made up of Israelis—Jews and Arabs—as well as foreign students of all religions, races and ethnic origins.

These students study and live together within the university community, contributing in no small measure—perhaps unconsciously—to the development of a world based on informed coexistence and peace, rather than one grounded in ignorance and hatred, doomed to eternal conflict and purposeless death and suffering.

Long before anyone dreamed of dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians, the Hebrew University, through one of its institutes named for one of our great Presidents of the last century—the Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace—initiated and developed substantial cooperative academic and research projects involving scholars from Israel and from its Arab neighbors Egypt, Jordan, the West Bank and Gaza.

Nowhere were there so many Arab and Israeli researchers involved in cooperative ventures aimed at achieving a better and mutually beneficial future than at the Hebrew University. These projects involved numerous academic disciplines: the social and exact sciences, agriculture, medicine, dental medicine and others.

Scores of practically oriented plans and reports were drawn up by these teams as to how to proceed regarding the resolution of such difficult issues as the sharing of water resources, the delineation of borders, and the protection of the environment. In addition, the university has conducted numerous in-service training courses for Arab professionals.

It is precisely the yearning and searching for the solving of age-old conflicts, for peaceful resolution that the savage advocates of hate and murder sought to strike down in their despicable bombing attack at the Hebrew University. But the human spirit is not so easily discouraged or defeated.

In condemning the bombing attack on the Hebrew University, the president of the American Council on Education, David Ward, took note of this significant aspect of the university. He wrote that: "The Hebrew University of Jerusalem has played a critical role in promoting co-existence between Israelis and Palestinians—as well as among people of all nationalities, religions and cultures. The terrible act at the Mount Scopus campus was intended to prevent the type of human interaction and discourse that can facilitate peaceful change in a more complex and challenging world."

It is this kind of hopeful spirit that was so brutally and viciously assaulted in the murderous bombing attack that took place at the Hebrew University's Frank Sinatra Student Center cafeteria on July 31, 2002.

This was more than another senseless terror attack, aimed at killing and maiming innocent people. It was an attack—knowingly or unknowingly—against everything that not just the Hebrew University but all of the free world holds dear.

Just as the American people are firm in their resolve not to allow the perpetrators of September 11th to destroy our society or our commitment to decency and peace, so too the people of Israel, including the Hebrew University community, are determined not to lose heart because of those who would seek to destroy that spirit of humanity which has been so devotedly cultivated there over the years.

Hebrew University's President Magidor stated that this was "an attack on understanding, tolerance and the quest for peace. [It] is a crime not only against Israel or the Jewish people, it is a crime against the free and enlightened world."

In the wake of this tragedy, President Magidor then asked himself "whether it still makes sense to strive for a peaceful society based on reason and understanding." Given the circumstances, his conclusion is both remarkable and also a perfect summation for the ethos of this institution. He concluded his letter to The New York Times by stating that "the answer came to me clearly, and it is summarized by the Hebrew word 'davka'—'despite everything'. We must not let them kill our drive of peace."

A bridge of co-existence in the strife-torn Middle East, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has been damaged. But it has not been destroyed, neither physically nor spiritually. That bridge will be repaired. It will be stronger even than it was in the past. And it will continue to serve as a source of pride and inspiration to the people of Israel, the United States, and all people everywhere who treasure life and liberty as the supreme human values.●

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 23, 2002.

NOTICE ENTITLED "CONTINUATION OF THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY WITH RESPECT TO UNITA" THAT WAS DECLARED IN EXECUTIVE ORDER 12685—PM 113

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

Section 202(d) of the National Emergencies Act, 50 U.S.C. 1622(d) provides for the automatic termination of a national emergency unless, prior to the anniversary date of its declaration, the President publishes in the Federal Register and transmits to the Congress a notice stating that the emergency is to continue in effect beyond the anniversary date. In accordance with this provision, I have sent the enclosed notice, stating that the emergency declared with respect to the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) is to continue in effect beyond September 26, 2002, to the Federal Register for publication. The most recent notice continuing this emergency was published in the Federal Register on September 25, 2001 (66 Fed. Reg. 49084).

The circumstances that led to the declaration on September 26, 1993, of a national emergency have not been resolved. The actions and policies of UNITA pose a continuing unusual and extraordinary threat to the foreign policy of the United States. United Nations Security Council Resolutions 864 (1993), 1127 (1997), and 1173 (1998) continue to oblige all member states to maintain sanctions. Discontinuation of the sanctions would have a prejudicial effect on the prospects for peace in Angola. For these reasons, I have determined that it is necessary to maintain in force the broad authorities necessary to apply economic pressure on UNITA to reduce its ability to pursue its military operations.

GEORGE W. BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, September 23, 2002.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. KYL (for himself and Mr. MCCAIN):

S. 2992. A bill to provide for adjustments to the Central Arizona Project in Arizona, to authorize the Gila River Indian Community water rights settlement to reauthorize and amend the Southern Arizona Water Rights Settlement Act of 1982, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Mr. KYL. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator McCAIN and myself I am introducing legislation today that would codify the largest water claims settlement in the history of Arizona. This bill represents the tremendous efforts of literally hundreds of people in Arizona and here in Washington over a period of five years. Looking ahead, this bill could ultimately be nearly as important to Arizona's future as was the authorization of the Central Arizona Project, CAP, itself.

Since Arizona began receiving CAP water from the Colorado River, litigation has divided water users over how the CAP water should be allocated and exactly how much Arizona was required to repay the Federal Government. This bill will, among other things, codify the settlement reached between the United States and the Central Arizona Water Conservation District over the State's repayment obligation for costs incurred by the United States in constructing the Central Arizona Project. It will also resolve, once and for all, the allocation of all remaining CAP water. This final allocation will provide the stability necessary for State water authorities to plan for Arizona's future water needs. In addition, approximately 200,000 acre-feet of CAP water will be made available to settle various Indian water claims in the State. The bill would also authorize the use of the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund, which is funded solely from revenues paid by Arizona entities, to construct irrigation works necessary for tribes with congressionally approved water settlements to use CAP water.

Title II of this bill settles the water rights claims of the Gila River Indian Community. It allocates nearly 100,000 acre-feet of CAP water to the Community, and provides funds to subsidize the costs of delivering CAP water and to construct the facilities necessary to allow the Community to fully utilize the water allocated to it in this settlement. Title III provides for long-needed amendments to the 1982 Southern Arizona Water Settlement Act for the Tohono O'odham Nation, which has never been fully implemented.

This bill will allow Arizona cities to plan for the future, knowing how much water they can count on. The Indian tribes will finally get "wet" water, as opposed to the paper rights to water they have now, and projects to use the water. In addition, mining companies, farmers, and irrigation delivery districts can continue to receive water without the fear that they will be stopped by Indian litigation.

While some minor issues remain, we have every confidence that these issues will be resolved before a hearing is scheduled. In addition, before the next Congress begins its work we hope that negotiations with the San Carlos Apache Tribe, the only party not yet included in the settlement, will move forward so that all claims can be resolved by this bill.

In summary, this bill is vital to the citizens of Arizona and will provide the certainty needed to move forward with water use decisions. Furthermore, the United States can avoid litigating water rights and damage claims and satisfy its trust responsibilities to the Tribes. The parties have worked many years to reach consensus rather than litigate, and I believe this bill represents the best opportunity to achieve a fair result for all the people of Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague, Senator KYL, as a co-sponsor of this important legislation, the Arizona Water Settlements Act of 2002, which would ratify negotiated settlements for Central Arizona Project, CAP, water allocations to municipalities, agricultural districts and Indian tribes, state CAP repayment obligations, and final adjudication of long-standing Indian water rights claims.

These settlements reflect five years of intensive negotiations by State, Federal, tribal, municipal, and private parties. I commend all those involved in these negotiations for their extraordinary commitment and diligence to reach this final stage in the settlement process. I also praise my colleague, Senator JON KYL, and Interior Secretary Gale Norton, for their leadership in facilitating these settlements. From my experience in legislating past agreements, I recognize the enormous challenge of these negotiations, and I appreciate their personal dedication to this settlement process.

This legislation is vitally important to Arizona's future because these settlements will bring greater certainty and stability to Arizona's water supply by completing the allocation of CAP water supplies. Pending water rights claims by various Indian tribes and non-Indian users will be permanently settled as well as the repayment obligations of the state of Arizona for construction of the CAP.

I join with Senator KYL today to express support for the agreements embodied in this bill and to encourage conclusion of this settlement process in the near future. Significant progress has been made in resolving key issues since we last sponsored a bill to facilitate this agreement in the 106th Congress. Some of these key issues pertain to the final apportionment of CAP water supplies, cost-sharing of CAP construction and water delivery systems, amendment of the 1982 settlement agreement with the Tohono O'odham Nation, mitigation measures necessitated by sustained drought conditions, and equitable apportionment of drought shortages.

While this bill reflects agreements reached on a host of issues after an intensive and extended effort by the numerous parties involved, it is important to emphasize that this bill does not represent the final settlement. All parties recognize that a very limited number of the provisions of this bill may be modified as the negotiations continue. We fully expect that the legislative process will culminate with a final agreement early in the next congressional session.

We introduce this bill today as an expression of our strong support of the various parties to successfully achieve conclusion to this process. The Arizona Water Settlements Act will be a historic accomplishment that will benefit all citizens of Arizona, the tribal communities, and the United States.

By Ms. LANDRIEU:

S. 2993. A bill to amend the Higher Education Act of 1965 to require institutions of higher education to preserve the educational status and financial resources of military personnel called to active duty; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

Ms. LANDRIEU. Mr. President, when the President gives the order to activate Reservists and National Guardsmen, the lives of those men and women are put on hold. Businesses, careers, and families are left behind so that America's interests may be served. Students make up a substantial part of our National Guard and Reserve forces. When these students are activated, it jeopardizes their academic standing, as well as their scholarships and grants. This bill would preserve their academic standing for the duration of their service as well as a 1-year period that follows that service. It would also preserve their scholarships and grants, as well as entitle them to a refund of unused tuition and fees. Federal laws already safeguards the employment status of activated Reservists and Guardsmen. It is time that we extend the same guarantee to students.

This legislation would require colleges, universities, and community colleges to grant National Guardsmen and Reservists a leave of military absence when they are called to active duty. This leave of absence would last while the student is serving on active duty and a 1-year period at the conclusion of active service. This bill would preserve the academic credits that the student had earned before being activated. It would also preserve the scholarships and grants awarded to the student before being activated. Under this legislation, students would be entitled to receive a refund of tuition and fees or credit the tuition and fees to the next period of enrollment after the student returns from military leave. If a student elects to receive a refund, it would allow them to receive a full refund, minus the percentage of time the student spent enrolled in classes.

The protections that are already afforded our Reservists and Guardsmen are appropriate considering the hardships they endure on the Nation's behalf. We need to acknowledge the many college students who are in the ranks of the Guard and Reserve and extend to them the protections they deserve. In this day of uncertainty on the world stage, our Reservists must be prepared to be called up at a moment's notice. Once they get to their duty station, they need to focus all of their attention on the mission. This legislation provides our student Reservists with the proper safeguards on their academic career which will allow them to accomplish their mission.

By Mrs. LINCOLN:

S. 2994. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide for the immediate and permanent repeal of the estate tax on family-owned businesses and farms, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance

Mrs. LINCOLN. Mr. President, just over one year ago, when budget surpluses reached over $5 trillion, Congress passed a tax cut bill that, in part, began the process providing estate and gift tax relief. Now, in 2002, the surpluses have disappeared, and Congress is making no progress on further estate tax relief. The reason for the stalemate is that some will vote only for complete repeal, while others offer targeted proposals based on prior tax laws that proved to be too complex and intrusive. In this environment, we are losing ground on coming to a fair resolution of this issue, and in the meantime, the current state of the law places many family-owned businesses in an uncertain and precarious position.

These are the same American-owned businesses that Congress initially sought to help when this effort began in the mid-1990's. Given these circumstances, I believe we must explore new ways to immediately and permanently target relief for these businesses, which are so important to our American economy. My bill does not seek to change current law to repeal the estate tax. It would leave in place the increases in the unified credit, the decreases in rates, and the repeal of the estate tax in 2010. My bill would only seek to rectify the special circumstances of family-owned businesses and farms, in an attempt, not to inflame the issue further, but to resolve this issue now and forever for those this effort was originally intended to help.

A serious problem for family-owned businesses is the rollercoaster-ride that current law places them on. Under the 2001 estate tax cut, family-owned businesses pay the estate tax until 2010 with modest reductions, and then the tax is completely repealed for one year. Then, in 2011, these businesses resume paying the tax at the high pre-2001 rates. Such a disparity in tax, depending on when one dies, causes great uncertainty for a business that must meet payroll, hire new people, make new capital investments, and service debt. Under this tax regime, we have made business planning virtually impossible. These family-owned businesses deserve better.

In fashioning a targeted approach for family-owned businesses, it is important to learn from the important lessons of the past. The Lincoln bill recognizes these lessons and seeks to reflect a thoughtful approach, which includes the good lessons learned and avoids the bad ones.

In 1995, Senator Dole and Senator Pryor introduced the Family Business Estate Relief Act, S. 1086. The government budget faced deficits, so the sponsors took a targeted approach to estate tax relief for family-owned businesses. Many in this body, on both sides of the aisle, supported Senators Dole and Pryor in this effort. The bill was an instant hit with overwhelming bipartisan support, and the support of most every small business trade association.

In 1997, the Qualified Family-Owned Business rules, in IRC Section 2057, were enacted into law. During the debate on these new rules, sponsors of the bill stated their concern that family farms and businesses are too often forced out of business at the death of a key family member. While this liquidity concern was all too real, it spawned an inadequate solution.

Over the years since enactment, the Family-Owned Business rules were roundly and rightly criticized for their unnecessary complexity, intrusiveness into family decisions, and paltry tax benefit. Finally, in 2001, Congress threw in the towel on the targeted approach of Section 2057, and repealed it after 2004. This experience, in many ways, poisoned the waters for estate tax relief for family-owned businesses, but I am confident we can do better.

So, I would like to propose an immediate and permanent plan for family-owned businesses. It is a targeted approach in times of budget deficits, and it is a conceptual approach, which, in the past, has garnered bipartisan support in times of political division. But given the hard lessons learned by Section 2057, my bill is not complex or intrusive. For those who don't believe a targeted approach can work, I urge you to take a look and study the Lincoln bill to immediately and permanently repeal the estate tax for family-owned farms and businesses.

Maybe one of the most important lessons learned is that the original goal was too limiting. So we have broadened our focus and we make clear our new goal. Simply put, the goal of the Lincoln bill that no family-owned farm or business will ever pay the estate tax, the same as publicly held businesses, which face no estate tax liability. If we focus merely on the liquidity of a family's estate, then we stop well short of treating American family farms and businesses the same as the GE's, Citigroups, and Ciscos of the world. We can do better. We must do better. And we must do better sooner than 2010. And we cannot afford to revert to pre-2001 law down the road. It is simply unacceptable.

With a new goal in mind, the Lincoln bill greatly simplifies the rules and delivers immediate and permanent repeal of the estate tax on family-owned businesses and farms. In doing so, the Lincoln bill throws away several troubling and burdensome provisions of Section 2057, including the 50-percent liquidity test, material participation rules for heirs, the passive income test, and recapture tax provisions. Further, the bill provides sensible working capital rules, to encourage family-owned businesses to grow, add new jobs, and make new capital investments.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD along with a detailed description of "What's Not in the Lincoln Bill", which contrasts this new proposal to Section 2057.

It is my hope that Americans who own family businesses will seriously consider my bill and not dismiss it out of hand because of past failures to target estate tax relief. I urge them to read my bill and consider the possibility for estate tax relief for them that can be done immediately and permanently.

There being no objection, the additional material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2994

COBI v. QFOBI—What's Not in the Lincoln Bill to Repeal the Estate Tax for Family-Owned Businesses

The Qualified Family-Owned Business rules, enacted in 1997, have been roundly, and rightly, criticized for their complexity and paltry tax benefit. Even more troubling, the rules have been criticized for their intrusiveness into a business owner's activities, and for their subjectivity, which allow for large areas of disagreement with the IRS. What went wrong with this effort to free family-owned businesses from the estate tax?

In 1997, the primary concern expressed by proponents of these rules was that family-owned farms and businesses are "too often forced out of businesses upon the death of a key owner." While this concern was, and is, all to real, it does not translate into a worthy goal on how we should treat American family-owned farms and businesses.

Sure, the government should not force these businesses to shut down, but the real point is that we must not stop there, we must encourage them to grow, add new jobs, and make new capital investments. In short, the 1997 qualified family-owned business rules were well intentioned, but they yielded a solution that is too limited and unworkable. So, we went back to the drawing board, taking with us the lessons learned from the qualified family-owned business rules.

The first task was to restate our concern and our goal. Simply put, the reformulated goal of the Lincoln bill is that no family-owned farm and business will ever pay the estate tax. It is often stated that family-owned businesses are subject to an estate tax that can reach over one-half the value of the business. This is true, but on top of this liability, a family-owned business is subject to estate tax liability each time that one generation passes the business to another generation. So, a family-owned business can pay the estate tax more than once over its lifetime.

In contrast, publicly held companies are never impacted by the estate tax. At the very least, we should treat family-owned businesses the same as publicly owned businesses life GE, IBM, and Cisco, which face no estate tax liability. Thus, our goal should be that no family-owned farm or business will ever pay the estate tax.

In pursuit of this goal, the Lincoln bill sheds many of the unnecessary and complex provisions under current law, and in doing so, it provides our best chance to enact immediate and permanent repeal of the estate tax for America's family owned farms and businesses.

The Lincoln bill includes the following improvements to current law:

1. Elimination of the Dollar Limitation on the Tax Benefit. Since the goal of the Lincoln bill is that no family-owned business will ever pay the estate tax, it places no arbitrary dollar or size limit on family-owned businesses. A deceased taxpayer's estate may elect to treat an unlimited portion of the decendent's estate as Carryover Business Interest, COBI. A COBI remains subject to all income and capital gain taxes with no basis adjustment.

Family-owned businesses, regardless of size, will be treated the same as their publicly held competitors, and thus, the economic disadvantage and distortion created by the estate tax on family-owned businesses would be eliminated.

2. Elimination of the 50-Percent Qualification Requirement. The principal argument in the past for repeal of the estate tax is its potential for forcing liquidation of a family-owned farm or business. Pursuant to this concern, the law, passed in 1997, created an extremely complex requirement that the value of the business must be at least 50 percent of the decedent's gross estate. Under this theory, it was presumed that a decedent's estate could afford to pay the tax if the business makes up 49 percent of the estate, but not if it is 50 percent of the estate. This example highlights the folly of this requirement, but it also demonstrates the importance of estate tax planning techniques in order to comply and receive the tax benefit. In the end, such a rule creates inequities among similarly situated taxpayers and benefits those with the best tax planning advise. Such incentives should be reduced whenever possible.

Under the Lincoln bill, this arbitrary requirement is eliminated, so that no family-owned farm or business would ever pay the estate tax, regardless of the portion of the estate that is comprised of the family-owned business. All family-owned businesses will no longer be required to shut down or plan to pay the estate tax. Instead, these businesses can increase working capital for expansion. The elimination of this requirement will also dramatically reduce complexity in the tax code and the subjectivity associated with the administration of the provision by the IRS.

3. Elimination of the Material Participation Requirements for Heirs. The material participation standard requires the IRS to measure a family member's activities on an hour-to-hour basis. This qualified family-owned business rules use this standard such that the IRS is required to monitor the activities of the heir for 10 years. This standard has been widely criticized as too intrusive. This may be the understatement of the year, and on top of that, it is an outrageous requirement the IRS could never effectively carry out if we wanted them to do so. Under the Lincoln bill, an heir is not required to participate in the business. Still, if he or she decides to sell or dispose of the COBI, capital gains and income taxes will continue to be payable and calculated using the decedent's carryover basis. But the estate tax will never put them out of business.

4. Elimination of the Recapture Provisions. Since the Lincoln bill does not require heirs to participate, recapture provisions are not necessary and therefore eliminated. The absence of these complex, arbitrary, and intrusive provisions eliminates the need for the IRS to monitor the daily activities of an heir for 10 years, a clearly intrusive requirement under current law.

5. Elimination of Passive Income Test. Under current law, a family owned business does not qualify for the tax benefit if more than 35 percent of its adjusted gross income is passive income in the tax year, which includes the decedent's date of death. This chance one-year arbitrary measurement of passive income is an insufficient and unreliable test of whether a family owned business has active business income. Further, the test is unnecessary in the face of a reasonable and workable passive asset test, as included in the Lincoln bill. See 6 below.

6. Modification of the Working Capital Rules. Under current law, a qualified family owned business may not hold cash or marketable securities in excess of the day-to-day working capital needs of the business. This rule does not recognize that family-owned businesses must retain liquid funds to expand by incurring debt or acquiring another business.

The Lincoln bill provides a standard that allows family owned businesses to retire debt and expand without facing the burden of the imposition of the estate tax. The standard under the Lincoln bill would allow the family owned business to own cash and securities "reasonably anticipated business needs." This standard is well established under current law, regulations, and IRS audit guidelines.

In any event, in order to prevent any predeath "stuffing," cash or marketplace securities shall be treated as passive assets if such cash or marketplace securities are transferred to the entity with 3 years of the decedent's date of death in any event. On the flip side, the IRS shall have the authority to increase the value of the COBI by that portion of those assets transferred from the COBI to the taxable estate within 3 years before the decedent's death.

By Mr. HOLLINGS (for himself and Mr. CLELAND):

S. 2995. A bill to improve economic opportunity and development in communities that are dependent on tobacco production, and for other purposes, to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

Mr HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a bill that the distinguished Senator from Georgia, Mr. CLELAND, and I are sponsoring to assist rural farming communities that have become dependent on tobacco in finding ways to diversify.

Right to the point: The tobacco program as we know it today is not sustainable for tobacco producers or the communities that have become dependent on tobacco for their standard of living. For too many years, too many people in this Chamber ignored the problem of the tobacco program, while addressing every other farm issue under the sun, and we now run the risk of putting tobacco farmers out of business with no concern for the impacts on rural communities. It is in the best interest of not only tobacco farmers and their communities, but of the future health of Americans, to pass this legislation

South Carolina has about 2,000 honest, hard-working tobacco farmers who, of late, can't make ends meet because the demand for tobacco is down so far. It's not that everyone in the world has all of a sudden stopped using tobacco. It's that American companies are using foreign-grown tobacco. It's cheaper for corporations to go to Brazil, or China, or Vietnam, than to buy tobacco from South Carolina or Georgia. The same thing that happened to textile workers in this country is now happening to our farmers, who have bills to pay, and children to send to college, and everything else like that.

In addition to low demand, farmers are in trouble because of past Federal policies intended to encourage farmers to get out of this business, which have instead led them to totally rely on tobacco. At the recommendation of the President's Tobacco Commission, we need to kick the habit of quota subsidies for tobacco farmers or this charade will never end.

Any legislation that fails to focus on the tobacco problem as a community, is not dealing with the problem as a whole. We have to help tobacco communities diversify their economic base, or they will plummet into further economic distress. This legislation provides these communities with the tools to attract new industries and, thus, new and different kinds of jobs for the area. We can't expect to buy farmers out, try to take care of them with a short-term fix, and not take care of the communities' long-term future.

This legislation does just that by making quota buy outs for farmers mandatory, offering special incentives for growers who transition their land from tobacco production and providing meaningful community assistance to bring economic development and diversify the rural economy.

Obviously, every one in this Chamber will want to know: how will we pay for it? What will these buyouts cost a government that this year is running a $412 billion budget deficit? It will not cost the American taxpayer a single dime. I will be paid for by fees assessed on manufacturers based on market share. We used a similar funding mechanism in the LEAF Act that had the full support of tobacco growing states.

When you come right down to it, this is a balancing act to fix a broken farm program without decimating rural communities and without cost to the American taxpayer. This is as balanced a way as Senator CLELAND and I know how to deal with this. The legislation has the support of the health care community and the tobacco growers alike. We have received letters of support from the Alliance for Health Economic and Agriculture Development, the Campaign for Tobacco Free Kids, the South Carolina Tobacco Growers Association, the South Carolina Farm Bureau, Flue-Cured Tobacco Cooperative Stabilization Corporation, and the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association. We urge your support.

By Mr. KOHL (for himself, Mr. SESSIONS, and Mrs. FEINSTEIN):

S. 2996. A bill to amend title 11, United States Code, to limit the value of certain real and personal property that a debtor may elect to exempt under State or local law, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Bankruptcy Abuse Reform Act of 2002. The Senate is very familiar with the issue of the homestead exemption. We have voted to close the homestead loophole in each of the past three Congresses. Each and every time, the Senate strongly supported our proposal to close the homestead loophole and prohibit wealthy debtors from moving to Florida or Texas to shield their multi-million dollar mansions from their creditors.

In practical terms, the unlimited homestead exemption means that a person can declare bankruptcy in Houston, for example, wipe out most of their debts, but shield from creditors a house worth an infinite amount. Our amendment will generously cap the homestead exemption at $125,000, that is, it permits a debtor to keep $125,000 of equity in his or her home after declaring bankruptcy.

This provision should be law by now. Unfortunately, the politics of the bankruptcy bill generally and this provision specifically have prevented the homestead loophole from being closed once and for all. During the course of this debate, we accepted a compromise that was weaker than we would have wanted, but would get at the worst abusers. It was not all that we wanted, nor was it that is needed, but is was a good first step.

To those that argue that the compromise that we agreed to is enough, we say it only got at some of the abusers who will use this provision in the law. Certainly, no matter how well we draft it, we will not be able to anticipate everything that some clever lawyer or devious debtor will think of to find a way around it. The only way to ensure that no debtor will be able to take advantage of this loophole is for the Congress to pass a hard cap. Only then can we be certain that the loophole would be closed once and for all.

It appears now, however, that the bankruptcy reform bill has stalled and may not be considered before the Congress adjourns for the year. It would be a miscarriage of justice to permit the year to end without addressing the most scandalous abuse of the bankruptcy laws in an era when numerous corporate executives will surely use the homestead exemption to protect millions of dollars from their creditors.

The country has been stunned recently by stories of corporate malfeasance, insider dealing, and fraud. And, not by fly-by-night companies, but rather the worst wrongdoing went on in companies that were entrusted with the nest eggs of millions of Americans in pension plans and mutant funds. Those investments have been lost. And, yet there is every chance that the people who caused these nightmares may walk away from their misdeeds and seek shelter in their luxury homes.

Whether we are discussing Ken Lay's $7.1 million, 13,000 square foot condominium or Andrew Fastow's newly built multi-million dollar home in one of Houston's swankiest neighborhoods, or Scott Sullivan's $15 million estate in Boca Raton, one thing is clear; these former executives must not be permitted to continue to live like kings in bankruptcy while their former employees are looking for their next paycheck.

Debtors should not be able to avoid their creditors through luck of geography or through strategic bankruptcy planning. The bottom line is that bankruptcy must be a refuge of last resort, not a financial planning tool for Ken Lay, Scott Sullivan or a host of others. It would be a shame if this Congress were not able to close the most egregious abuse of all in the bankruptcy laws. It is time to close the homestead exemption loophole once and for all.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Bankruptcy Abuse Reform Act of 2002 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DODD (for himself, Mr. GREGG, Mr. KENNEDY, Ms. COLLINS, Mr. WELLSTONE, and Mr. DEWINE):

S. 2998. A bill to reauthorize the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act of 1978, and the Abandoned Infants Assistance Act of 1988, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today with my colleague from New Hampshire, Senator GREGG, to introduce the Keeping Children and Families Safe Act. We are pleased to be joined by Senators KENNEDY, COLLINS, WELLSTONE, and DEWINE.

Child abuse and neglect continue to be significant problems in the United States. Recent reports present startling indications of child maltreatment in the United States.

About 3 million referrals concerning the welfare of about 5 million children were made to Child Protection Services, CPS, agencies throughout the Nation in 2000. Of these referrals, about two-thirds, 62 percent, were "screened-in" for further assessment and investigation. Professionals, including teachers, law enforcement officers, social service workers, and physicians made more than half, 56 percent, of the screened-in reports. About 879,000 children were found to be victims of child maltreatment. About two-thirds, 63 percent, suffered neglect, including medical neglect; 19 percent were physically abused; 10 percent were sexually abused; and 8 percent were emotionally maltreated.

Many of these children fail to receive adequate protection and services. Nearly half, 45 percent, of these children failed to receive services.

The most tragic consequence of child maltreatment is death. The April maltreatment summary data released by the Department of Health and Human Services, HHS, shows that about 1,200 children died of abuse and neglect in 2000. Children younger than six years of age accounted for 85 percent of child fatalities and children younger than one year of age accounted for 44 percent of child fatalities.

Child abuse is not a new phenomenon. For more than a decade, numerous reports have called attention to the tragic abuse and neglect of our children and the inadequacy of our Child Protection Services, CPS, systems to protect our children.

In 1990, the U.S. Advisory Board on Child Abuse and Neglect concluded that "child abuse and neglect is a national emergency." In 1995, the U.S. Advisory Board on Child Abuse and Neglect reported that "State and local CPS caseworkers are often overextended and cannot adequately function under their current caseloads." The report also stated that, "in many jurisdictions, caseloads are so high that CPS response is limited to taking the complaint call, making a single visit to the home, and deciding whether or not the complaint is valid, often without any subsequent monitoring of the family."

A 1997 General Accounting Office, GAO, report found, "the CPS system is in crisis, plagued by difficult problems, such as growing caseloads, increasingly complex social problems and underlying child maltreatment, and ongoing systemic weaknesses in day-to-day operations." According to GAO, CPS weaknesses include "difficulty in maintaining a skilled workforce; the inability to consistently follow key policies and procedures designed to protect children; developing useful case data and record-keeping systems, such as automated case management; and establishing good working relationships with the courts."

According to the May 2001 "Report from the Child Welfare-Workforce Survey: State and County Data and Findings" conducted by the American Public Human Services Association, APHSA, the Child Welfare League of America, CWLA, and the Alliance for Children and Families, annual staff turnover is high and morale is low among CPS workers. The report found that CPS workers had an annual turnover rate of 22 percent, 76 percent higher than the turnover rate for total agency staff. The "preventable" turnover rate was 67 percent, or two-thirds higher than the rate for all other direct service workers and total agency staff. In some States, 75 percent or more of staff turnovers were preventable.

States rated a number of retention issues as highly problematic. In descending order they are: workloads that are too high and/or demanding; caseloads that are too high; too much worker time spent on travel, paperwork, courts, and meetings; workers not feeling valued by the agency; low salaries; supervision problems; and insufficient resources for families and children.

To prevent turnover and retain quality CPS staff, some States have begun to increase in-service training, increase education opportunities, increase supervisory training, increase or improve orientation, increase worker safety, and offer flex-time or changes in office hours. Most States, however, continue to grapple with staff turnover and training issues.

Continued public criticism of CPS efforts, continued frustration by CPS staff and child welfare workers, and continued abuse and neglect, and death, of our Nation's children, served as the backdrop as we sought to draft a CAPTA reauthorization bill this year.

The Child Protection System mission must focus on the safety of children. To ensure that the system works as intended, CPS needs to be appropriately staffed. The staff need to receive appropriate training and cross-training to better recognize substance abuse and domestic violence problems. Triage can help in communities with numerous abuse reports so that those reports where children are most at-risk of imminent harm can be prioritized. More collaborations in communities between CPS, health agencies, including mental health agencies, schools, and community-based groups can help to strengthen families. Prevention programs and activities to prevent child abuse and neglect for families at-risk can improve the likelihood that a child will grow up in a home without violence, abuse, or neglect.

Beyond the CAPTA title of this legislation, our bill reauthorizes the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act, including the creation of a new program to address the needs of children who witness domestic violence, the Adoption Opportunities Act, and the Abandoned Infants Assistance Act.

There is not much time before Congress adjourns for the session. And there are many outstanding issues for Congress to address. Child protection ought not be a partisan issue. I urge my colleagues to join us in supporting this bill and to strengthen child protection laws before we adjourn for the year.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill be printed in the Record, followed by the text of the bill.

There being no objection, the additional material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Keeping Children and Families Safe Act

Brief Summary

The Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, CAPTA, authorizes research and demonstration projects related to preventing and treating child abuse and neglect, grants to States to improve child protection systems and, grants to support community-based family resource and support services. Authorization for CAPTA expired with FY2001 but Congress has continued to fund its programs.

Reauthorizes CAPTA with increased funding. The bill would reauthorize CAPTA through FY2007 and authorized $200 million for CAPTA programs. The FY2002 appropriation for CAPTA programs was $81.6 million.

Encourages new training and better qualifications for child and family service workers. The bill would recommend grants for a variety of training programs and research activities designed to improve training to child protective services and other child and family service workers, including supervisors. Suggested projects include: training workers on how to best work with families from initial investigation through treatment; cross-training to better recognize neglect, domestic violence or substance abuse in a family; training to strengthen linkages between Child Protection Services (CPS) and health agencies including physical and mental health services; and to promote partnerships that offer creative approaches to meet the needs of abused children; as well as training for CPS workers on their legal duties. The bill would also encourage attention to staff recruitment and retention issues.

Encourages links between agencies to improve services to children. The bill would seek to create or improve links between child protection services and education, health, mental health, and judicial systems to ensure that children who are abused and neglected are properly identified and receive referrals to appropriate services. It would further encourage greater collaboration between child protective services and the juvenile justice system to ensure that children who move between these two systems do so smoothly and receive appropriate services. In addition, the bill would promote partnerships between public agencies and community-based organizations to provide child abuse and neglect prevention and treatment programs. The bill would also require States, as a condition of receiving State grant money, to have policies and procedures to have triage for the referral of a child not at imminent risk of harm to a community or voluntary child maltreatment prevention service; to improve the training, retention, and supervision of caseworkers; to address the needs of infants who have been prenatally exposed to illegal substances, including referral to CPS and other services; to have provisions requiring CPS workers to inform individuals of child maltreatment allegations made against them; and to perform background checks on all adults in prospective foster care households.

Strengths and expands the National Child Abuse Clearinghouse. The role of the National Child Abuse Clearinghouse would be strengthened and expanded to not only maintain information about effective child abuse prevention programs, but also to maintain information about best practices used for improving CPS and best practices for making referrals related to addressing the physical, developmental, and health needs of abused and neglected children.

Broadens access to technical assistance and grant funds. CAPTA currently authorize the Department of Health and Human Services, HHS, to fund certain kinds of child maltreatment related demonstration programs and to provide certain technical assistance. In general, grants or contracts may be made with public and nonprofit private entities. The bill would allow for-profit private entities to access technical assistance and to operate HHS-funded demonstration programs.

Strengthens local oversight. States are now required to appoint citizen review panels to oversee the policies and procedures of State and local child protection service agencies. The bill would require these panels to also study agency "practices," do public outreach and allow for public comment, and include recommendations for changes in an annual report to the State. States would be required to make a written response regarding whether or how they will incorporate the recommendations to improve the State and local child protection systems.

Requires new study. The bill would require HHS to conduct the 4th National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect and to report its findings within 4 years of enactment of the legislation. The last National Incidence Study was conducted in 1993.

Revises Title II Community-Based Family Resource and Support Grants. The bill revises Title II to support community-based efforts to develop, operate, expand, enhance, and where appropriate, to network, initiatives aimed at the prevention of child abuse and neglect and supports coordinated resources and activities to better strengthen and support families to reduce the likelihood of child abuse and neglect.

Title II reauthorizes the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act (FVPSA), which provides assistance to states, Tribes, and Tribal organizations to assist in efforts to increase public awareness about family violence and provide immediate shelter and related assistance to victims of family violence and their children. The reauthorization: extends the authorization of existing programs to 2007; repeals three programs: The Family Member Abuse and Documentation Project, Model State Leadership Grants, and the Youth Education and Domestic Violence Program; increases the authorization for the National Domestic Violence Hotline to $5 million; carves out 10 percent of State Grant funds for State Domestic Violence Coalitions; allows for the Secretary to retain administrative funds to implement and evaluate FVPSA programs; establishes a highly secure electronic network to link domestic violence shelters and service providers and the National Domestic Violence Hotline on a confidential website. The website would provide a continuously updated list of shelter availability anywhere in the United States at any time and would provide comprehensive information describing the services each shelter provides such as medical, social and bilingual services. It would also provide internet access to shelters that do not have appropriate technology; creates the Children Exposed to Domestic Violence Program to provide funds for: shelters and other domestic violence service providers to run programs to address the physical, emotional and logistical needs of children who enter programs with their mothers who are abused; training of child welfare, and where appropriate, court and law enforcement personnel to assist them in addressing cases where child abuse and domestic violence intersect; and, nonprofit agencies to bring various service providers together to design and implement intervention programs for children who witness domestic violence.

Makes several technical corrections to the bill.

Title III of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act of 1978, as amended (Public Law 95-266) authorizes the Adoption Opportunities Program. The program is intended to eliminate barriers to adoption and to provide permanent homes for children who would benefit from adoption, particularly special needs children and disabled infants with life-threatening conditions.

Seeks to eliminate interjurisdictional barriers to adoption. As part of a revised and updated findings section, the bill would explicitly include the elimination of jurisdictional barriers to adoption. It notes that the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997 prohibited delay or denial of placement of a child across jurisdictional lines, where an appropriate adoptive family was available. The bill would require the Secretary of HHS to fund public or private entities, including States, to eliminate barriers to placing children for adoption across jurisdictional lines. Purposes of this funding would include: developing a uniform homestudy standard and protocols for acceptance of homestudies between States and jurisdictions; developing models of financing cross-jurisdictional placements; expanding capacity of all adoption exchanges to serve increasing numbers of children, including older children least likely to currently be adopted; developing training materials and training social workers on preparing and moving children across State lines; and developing and supporting models for networking among agencies, adoption exchanges, and parent support groups across jurisdictional boundaries.

Within one year of enactment, the bill would require HHS, in consultation with the General Accounting Office, to facilitate interjurisdictional adoption of foster children. Separately, the bill would also make interjurisdictional adoption issues, including financing and best practices, a part of a larger study HHS would be required to conduct on adoption placements. Current law generally allows HHS to fund services provided by public and nonprofit private agencies only. The bill generally allows HHS to include for-profit agencies among eligible grantees.

Increases funding for Adoption Opportunities grants. The current authorization for Adoption Opportunities is $20 million. The bill would increase the authorization to $40 million for FY2003 and such sums as necessary for FY2004–FY2007. (The Adoption Opportunities program received an appropriation of $27.4 million for FY2002.)

The Abandoned Infants Assistance Act of 1988, as amended, Public Law 100-505, authorizes demonstration grants to public and private nonprofit agencies for activities such as preventing the abandonment of infants, identifying and addressing the needs of abandoned infants, recruiting and training foster families for abandoned children, providing residential care for infants and young children who cannot live with their families or be placed in foster care, providing respite care for families and foster families, and recruiting and training health and social services personnel to work with abandoned children.

Broadens priority for services. Under current law grantees must ensure priority for their services is given to abandoned infants and young children who are HIV-infected, perinatally exposed to HIV, or perinatally drug-exposed. The bill would maintain priority service for these children but would also broaden the priority category to include abandoned infants and young children who have "life threatening illness[es]" or "other special medical need[s]."

Requires studies. The bill would require that HHS conduct a study that: estimates the number of infants and young children who are relinquished, abandoned or found deceased in the United States and the number of young children who are HIV positive, have a life-threatening illness or other special medical need, or have been perinatally exposed to HIV or a dangerous drug; estimates the annual number of infants and young children who are victims of homicide; determines the characteristics of parents who have abandoned a child within a year of the child's birth; and estimates the annual costs incurred by all levels of government to provide housing and care for abandoned infants and young children.

The bill would further require HHS to report findings of this study to Congress not later than 36 months after enactment of the legislation. Separately, HHS would be required to evaluate and report on effective intervention methods to prevent abandonment of children and effective ways of responding to the needs of abandoned children.

Increases funds for Abandonment Infants Assistance grants. The current authorization for Abandoned Infants Assistance is $35 million. The bill would increase authorization to $45 million for FY2003 and such sums as necessary for FY2004–FY2007. The Abandoned Infants Assistance program received an appropriation of $12.2 million for FY2002.
